Since my last annual message the exchange has been made of the ratification of a treaty of commerce and navigation with Belgium; and of conventions with the Mexican republic for the further extension of the joint commission respecting claims; with the Hawaiian Islands for commercial reciprocity; and with the Ottoman empire for extradition; all of which have been duly proclaimed.

The court of commissioners of Alabama claims has prosecuted its important duties very assiduously and very satisfactorily. It convened and was organized on the 22d day of July, 1874, and by the terms of the act under which it was created was to exist for one year from that date. The act provided, however, that, should it be found impracticable to complete the work of the court before the expiration of the year, the President might, by proclamation, extend the time of its duration to a period not more than six months beyond the expiration of the one year.

Having received satisfactory evidence that it would be impracticable to complete the work within the time originally fixed, I issued a proclamation (a copy of which is presented herewith) extending the time of duration of the court for a period of six months from and after the 22d day of July last.

A report made through the clerk of the court (communicated herewith) shows the condition of the calendar on the 1st of November last and the large amount of work which has been accomplished. Thirteen hundred and eighty-two claims have been presented, of which six hundred and eighty-two had been disposed of at the date of the report. I am informed that one hundred and seventy cases were decided during the month of November. Arguments are being made and decisions given in the remaining cases with all the dispatch consistent with the proper consideration of the questions submitted. Many of these claims are in behalf of mariners, or depend on the evidence of mariners, whose absence has delayed the taking or the return of the necessary evidence.

It is represented to me that it will be impracticable for the court to finally dispose of all the cases before it within the present limit of its duration. Justice to the parties-claimant, who have been at large expense in preparing their claims and obtaining the evidence in their support, suggests a short extension, to enable the court to dispose of all of the claims which have been presented.

I recommend the legislation which may be deemed proper to enable the court to complete the work before it.

I recommend that some suitable provision be made, by the creation of a special court or by conferring the necessary jurisdiction upon some appropriate tribunal, for the consideration and determination of the claims of aliens against the Government of the United States which have arisen within some reasonable limitation of time or which may hereafter arise, excluding all claims barred by treaty provisions or otherwise. It has been found impossible to give proper consideration to these claims by the Executive Departments of the Government. Such a tribunal would afford an opportunity to aliens, other than British subjects, to present their claims on account of acts committed against their persons or property during the rebellion, as also to those subjects of Great Britain whose claims, having arisen subsequent to the 9th day of April, 1865, could not be presented to the late commission, organized pursuant to the provisions of the treaty of Washington.

The electric telegraph has become an essential and indispensable agent in the transmission of business and social messages. Its operation on land, and within the limit of particular States, is necessarily under the control of the jurisdiction within which it operates. The lines on the high seas, however, are not subject to the particular control of any one government. In 1869 a concession was granted by the French government to a company which proposed to lay a cable from the shores of France to the United States.

At that time there was a telegraphic connection between the United States and the continent of Europe, (through the possessions of Great Britain at either end of the line,) under the control of an association, which had, at large outlay of capital and at great risk, demonstrated the practicability of maintaining such means of communication. The cost of correspondence by this agency was great, possibly not too large, at the time, for a proper remuneration for so hazardous and so costly an enterprise. It was, however, a heavy charge upon a means of communication which the progress in the social and commercial intercourse of the world found to be a necessity, and the obtaining of this French concession showed that other capital than that already invested was ready to enter into competition, with assurance of adequate return for its outlay. Impressed with the conviction that the interests, not only of the people of the United States, but of the world at large, demanded, or would demand, the multiplication of such means of communication between separated continents, I was desirous that the proposed connection should be made, but certain provisions of this concession were deemed by me to be objectionable, particularly one which gave for a long term of years the exclusive right of telegraphic communication by submarine cable between the shores of France and the United States. I could not concede that any power should claim the right to land a cable on the shores of the United States and at the same time deny to the United States, or to its citizens or grantees, an equal right to land a cable on its shores.

The right to control the conditions for the laying of a cable within the jurisdictional waters of the United States, to connect our shores with those of any foreign state, pertains exclusively to the Government of the United States, under such limitations and conditions as Congress may impose. In the absence of legislation by Congress, I was unwilling, on the one hand, to yield to a foreign state the right to say that its grantees might land on our shores while it denied a similar right to our people to land on its shores, and on the other hand I was reluctant to deny to the great interests of the world and of civilization the facilities of such communication as were proposed. I therefore withheld any resistance to the landing of the cable, on condition that the offensive monopoly feature of the concession be abandoned, and that the right of any cable which may be established by authority of this Government to land upon French territory, and to connect with French land lines and enjoy all the necessary facilities or privileges incident to the use thereof upon as favorable terms as any other company, be conceded. As the result thereof the company in question renounced the exclusive privilege and the representative of France was informed that, understanding this relinquishment to be construed as granting the entire reciprocity and equal facilities which had been demanded, the opposition to the landing of the cable was withdrawn. The cable under this French concession was landed in the month of July, 1869, and has been an efficient and valuable agent of communication between this country and the other continent. It soon passed under the control, however, of those who had the management of the cable connecting Great Britain with this continent, and thus whatever benefit to the public might have ensued from competition between the two lines was lost, leaving only the greater facilities of an additional line and the additional security in case of accident to one of them. But these increased facilities and this additional security, together with the control of the combined capital of the two companies, gave also greater power to prevent the future construction of other lines and to limit the control of telegraphic communication between the two continents to those possessing the lines already laid.

Within a few months past a cable has been laid, known as the United States Direct Cable Company, connecting the United States directly with Great Britain. As soon as this cable was reported to be laid and in working order the rates of the then existing consolidated companies were greatly reduced. Soon, however, a break was announced in this new cable, and immediately the rates of the other line, which had been reduced, were again raised. This cable being now repaired, the rates appear not to be reduced by either line from those formerly charged by the consolidated companies. There is reason to believe that large amounts of capital, both at home and abroad, are ready to seek profitable investment in the advancement of this useful and most civilizing means of intercourse and correspondence. They await, however, the assurance of the means and conditions on which they may safely be made tributary to the general good. As these cable telegraph lines connect separate states, there are questions as to their organization and control which probably can be best, if not solely, settled by conventions between the respective states. In the absence, however, of international conventions on the subject, municipal legislation may secure many points which appear to me important, if not indispensable, for the protection of the public against the extortions which may result from a monopoly of the right of operating cable telegrams or from a combination between several lines.

1. No line should be allowed to land on the shores of the United States, under the concession from another power, which does not admit the right of any other line or lines, formed in the United States, to land and freely connect with and operate through its land lines.

2. No line should be allowed to land on the shores of the United States which is not by treaty stipulation with the government from whose shores it proceeds, or by prohibition in its charter or otherwise to the satisfaction of this Government, prohibited from consolidating or amalgamating with any other cable-telegraph line, or combining therewith for the purpose of regulating and maintaining the cost of telegraphing.

3. All lines should be bound to give precedence in the transmission of the official messages of the governments of the two countries between which it may be laid.

4. A power should be reserved to the two governments, either conjointly or to each as regards the messages dispatched from its shores, to fix a limit to the charges to be demanded for the transmission of messages.

I present this subject to the earnest consideration of Congress.

In the mean time, and unless Congress otherwise direct, I shall not oppose the landing of any telegraphic cable which complies with and assents to the points above enumerated, but will feel it my duty to prevent the landing of any which does not conform to the first and second points as stated, and which will not stipulate to concede to this Government the precedence in the transmission of its official messages and will not enter into a satisfactory arrangement with regard to its charges.

Among the pressing and important subjects to which, in my opinion, the attention of Congress should be directed, are those relating to fraudulent naturalization and expatriation. The United States, with great liberality, offers its citizenship to all who, in good faith, comply with the requirements of law. These requirements are as simple and upon as favorable terms to the emigrant as the high privilege to which he is admitted can or should permit I do not propose any additional requirements to those which the law now demands. But the very simplicity and the want of unnecessary formality in our law have made fraudulent naturalization not infrequent, to the discredit and injury of all honest citizens, whether native or naturalized. Cases of this character are continually being brought to the notice of the Government by our representatives abroad, and also those of persons resident in other countries, most frequently those who, if they have remained in this country long enough to entitle them to become naturalized, have generally not much overpassed that period, and have returned to the country of their origin, where they reside, avoiding all duties to the United States by their absence, and claiming to be exempt from all duties to the country of their nativity and of their residence, by reason of their alleged naturalization. It is due to this Government itself, and to the great mass of the naturalized citizens who entirely, both in name and in fact, become citizens of the United States that the high privilege of citizenship of the United States should not be held by fraud, or in derogation of the laws and of the good name of every honest citizen.

On many occasions it has been brought to the knowledge of the Government that certificates of naturalization are held and protection or interference claimed by parties who admit that not only they were not within the United States at the time of the pretended naturalization, but that they have never resided in the United States; in others, the certificate and record of the court show on their face that the person claiming to be naturalized had not resided the required time in the United States; in others, it is admitted upon examination that the requirements of law have not been complied with; in some cases, even, such certificates have been matter of purchase. These are not isolated cases, arising at rare intervals, but of common occurrence, and which are reported from all quarters of the globe. Such occurrences cannot and do not fail to reflect upon the Government and injure all honest citizens. Such a fraud being discovered, however, there is no practicable means within the control of the Government by which the record of naturalization can be vacated, and should the certificate be taken up, as it usually is, by the diplomatic and consular representatives of the government to whom it may have been presented, there is nothing to prevent the person claiming to have been naturalized from obtaining a new certificate from the court in place of that which has been taken from him. The evil has become so great and of such frequent occurrence that I cannot too earnestly recommend that some effective measures be adopted to provide a proper remedy and means for the vacating of any record thus fraudulently made, and of punishing the guilty parties to the transaction.

In this connection I refer also to the question of expatriation and the election of nationality.

The United States was foremost in upholding the right of expatriation and was principally instrumental in overthrowing the doctrine of perpetual allegiance. Congress has declared the right of expatriation to be a natural and inherent right of all people; but, while many other nations have enacted laws providing what formalities shall be necessary to work a change of allegiance, the United States has enacted no provisions of law and has in no respect marked out how and when expatriation may be accomplished by its citizens. Instances are brought to the attention of the Government where citizens of the United States, either naturalized or native born, have formally become citizens or subjects of foreign powers, but who, nevertheless, in the absence of any provisions of legislation on this question, when involved in difficulties or when it seems to be their interest, claim to be citizens of the United States and demand the intervention of a Government which they have long since abandoned and to which, for years, they have rendered no service, nor held themselves in any way amenable. In other cases naturalized citizens, immediately after naturalization, have returned to their native country, have become engaged in business, have accepted offices or pursuits inconsistent with American citizenship, and evidence no intent to return to the United States until called upon to discharge some duty to the country where they are residing, when at once they assert their citizenship and call upon the representatives of the Government to aid them in their unjust pretensions. It is but justice to all bona fide citizens that no doubt should exist on such questions, and that Congress should determine, by enactment of law, how expatriation may be accomplished and change of citizenship be established.

I also invite your attention to the necessity of regulating by law the status of American women who may marry foreigners and of defining more fully that of children born in a foreign country of American parents who may reside abroad, and also of some further provision regulating or giving legal effect to marriages of American citizens contracted in foreign countries. The correspondence submitted herewith shows a few of the constantly occurring questions on these points presented to the consideration of the Government. There are few subjects to engage the attention of Congress on which more delicate relations or more important interests are dependent.

In the month of July last the building erected for the Department of State was taken possession of and occupied by that Department.

I am happy to announce that the archives and valuable papers of the Government in the custody of that Department are now safely deposited and properly cared for.

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury shows the receipts from customs for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, to have been $163,103,833.69, and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, to have been $157,167,722.35, a decrease for the last fiscal year of $5,936,111.34.

Receipts from internal revenue for the year ending the 30th of June, 1874, $102,409,784.90, and for the year ending June 30, 1875 $110,007,493.58; increase, $7,597,708.68.

The report also shows a complete history of the workings of the Department for the last year and contains recommendations for reforms and for legislation which I concur in, but cannot comment on so fully as I should like to do if space would permit, but will confine myself to a few suggestions which I look upon as vital to the best interests of the whole people, coming within the purview of "Treasury:" I mean specie resumption. Too much stress cannot be laid upon this question, and I hope Congress may be induced, at the earliest day practicable, to insure the consummation of the act of the last Congress, at its last session, to bring about specie resumption "on and after the 1st day of January, 1879," at furthest. It would be a great blessing if this could be consummated even at an earlier day. Nothing seems to me more certain than that a full, healthy, and permanent reaction cannot take place in favor of the industries and financial welfare of the country until we return to a measure of values recognized throughout the civilized world. While we use a currency not equivalent to this standard, the world's recognized standard, specie, becomes a commodity, like the products of the soil, the surplus seeking a market wherever there is a demand for it. Under our present system we should want none, nor would we have any, were it not that customs-dues must be paid in coin, and because of the pledge to pay interest on the public debt in coin. The yield of precious metals would flow out for the purchase of foreign productions and leave the United States "hewers of wood and drawers of water" because of wiser legislation on the subject of finance by the nations with whom we have dealings.

I am not prepared to say that I can suggest the best legislation to secure the end most heartily recommended. It will be a source of great gratification to me to be able to approve any measure of Congress looking effectively toward securing "resumption."

Unlimited inflation would probably bring about specie payments more speedily than any legislation looking to the redemption of the legal-tenders in coin; but it would be at the expense of honor. The legal-tenders would have no value beyond settling present liabilities, or, properly speaking, repudiating them. They would buy nothing after debts were all settled.

There are a few measures which seem to me important in this connection, and which I commend to your earnest consideration:

A repeal of so much of the legal-tender act as makes these notes receivable for debts contracted after a date to be fixed in the act itself, say, not later than the 1st of January, 1877. We should then have quotations at real values, not fictitious ones. Gold would no longer be at a premium, but currency at a discount. A healthy reaction would set in at once, and with it a desire to make the currency equal to what it purports to be. The merchants, manufacturers, and tradesmen of every calling could do business on a fair margin of profit, the money to be received having an unvarying value. Laborers and all classes who work for stipulated pay or salary would receive more for their income, because extra profits would no longer be charged by the capitalist to compensate for the risk of a downward fluctuation in the value of the currency.

Second. That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to redeem, say, not to exceed two million dollars monthly of legal-tender notes, by issuing in their stead a long bond, bearing interest at the rate of 3.65 per cent. per annum, of denominations ranging from $50 up to $1,000 each. This would in time reduce the legal-tender notes to a volume that could be kept afloat without demanding redemption in large sums suddenly.

Third. That additional power be given to the Secretary of the Treasury to accumulate gold for final redemption, either by increasing revenue, curtailing expenses, or both—it is preferable to do both; and I recommend that reduction of expenditures be made wherever it can be done without impairing government obligations or crippling the due execution thereof. One measure for increasing the revenue—and the only one I think of—is the restoration of the duty on tea and coffee. These duties would add, probably, $18,000,000 to the present amount received from imports, and would in no way increase the prices paid for those articles by the consumers. These articles are the products of countries collecting revenue from exports, and as we—the largest consumers—reduce the duties, they proportionally increase them. With this addition to the revenue many duties now collected, and which give but an insignificant return for the cost of collection, might be remitted, and to the direct advantage of consumers at home. I would mention those articles which enter into manufactures of all sorts. All duty paid upon such articles go directly to the cost of the article when manufactured here, and must be paid for by the consumers. These duties not only come from the consumers at home, but act as a protection to foreign manufacturers of the same completed articles in our own and distant markets.

I will suggest or mention another subject bearing upon the problem of "how to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to accumulate balances." It is to devise some better method of verifying claims against the Government than at present exists through the Court of Claims, especially those claims growing out of the late war. Nothing is more certain than that a very large percentage of the amounts passed and paid are either wholly fraudulent or are far in excess of the real losses sustained. The large amount of losses proven—on good testimony, according to existing laws, by affidavits of fictitious or unscrupulous persons—to have been sustained on small farms and plantations are not only far beyond the possible yield of those places for any one year, but, as every one knows who has had experience in tilling the soil and who has visited the scenes of these spoliations, are, in many instances, more than the individual claimants were ever worth, including their personal and real estate.

The report of the Attorney-General, which will be submitted to Congress at an early day, will contain a detailed history of awards made and of claims pending of the class here referred to.

The report of the Secretary of War, accompanying this message, gives a detailed account of Army operations for the year just passed, expenses for maintenance, &c., with recommendations for legislation to which I respectfully invite your attention. To some of these I invite special attention. First, the necessity of making $300,000 of the appropriation for the Subsistence Department available before the beginning of the next fiscal year. Without this provision, troops at points distant from supply production must either go without food or existing laws must be violated. It is not attended with cost to the Treasury. Second, his recommendation for the enactment of a system of annuities for the families of deceased officers by voluntary deductions from the monthly pay of officers. This, again, is not attended with burden upon the Treasury, and would for the future relieve much distress which every old Army officer has witnessed in the past—of officers dying suddenly or being killed, leaving families without even the means of reaching their friends, if fortunate enough to have friends to aid them. Third, the repeal of the law abolishing mileage, and a return to the old system. Fourth, the trial with torpedoes under the Corps of Engineers, and appropriation for the same. Should war ever occur between the United States and any maritime power, torpedoes will be among if not the most effective and cheapest auxiliary for the defense of harbors, and also in aggressive operations, that we can have. Hence, it is advisable to learn by experiment their best construction and application as well as effect. Fifth, a permanent organization for the Signal Service Corps. This service has now become a necessity of peace as well as war under the advancement made by the present able management. Sixth, a renewal of the appropriation for compiling the official records of the war, &c.

The condition of our Navy at this time is a subject of satisfaction. It does not contain, it is true, any of the powerful cruising iron-clads which make so much of the maritime strength of some other nations; but neither our continental situation nor our foreign policy requires that we should have a large number of ships of this character, while this situation and the nature of our ports combine to make those of other nations little dangerous to us under any circumstances.

Our Navy does contain, however, a considerable number of iron-clads of the Monitor class, which, though not properly cruisers, are powerful and effective for harbor defense and for operations near our own shores. Of these, all the single-turreted ones, fifteen in number, have been substantially rebuilt, their rotten wooden beams replaced with iron, their hulls strengthened, and their engines and machinery thoroughly repaired, so that they are now in the most efficient condition, and ready for sea as soon as they can be manned and put in commission.

The five double-turreted iron-clads belonging to our Navy, by far the most powerful of our ships for fighting purposes, are also in hand undergoing complete repairs, and could be ready for sea in periods varying from four to six months. With these completed according to the present design, and our two iron torpedo-boats now ready, our iron-clad fleet will be, for the purposes of defense at home, equal to any force that can readily be brought against it.

Of our wooden Navy, also, cruisers of various sizes to the number of about forty, including those now in commission, are in the Atlantic, and could be ready for duty as fast as men could be enlisted for those not already in commission. Of these, one-third are in effect new ships, and though some of the remainder need considerable repairs to their boilers and machinery, they all are, or can readily be made, effective. This constitutes a fleet of more than fifty war-ships, of which fifteen are iron-clad, now in hand on the Atlantic coast.

The Navy has been brought to this condition by a judicious and practical application of what could be spared from the current appropriations of the last few years and from that made to meet the possible emergency of two years ago. It has been done quietly, without proclamation or display, and though it has necessarily straightened the Department in its ordinary expenditure, and as far as the iron-clads are concerned has added nothing to the cruising force of the Navy, yet the result is not the less satisfactory, because it is to be found in a great increase of real rather than apparent force. The expenses incurred in the maintenance of an effective naval force, in all its branches are necessarily large, but such force is essential to our position, relations, and character, and affects seriously the weight of our principles and policy throughout the whole sphere of national responsibilities.

The estimates for the regular support of this branch of the service for the next year amount to a little less in the aggregate than those made for the current year; but some additional appropriations are asked for objects not included in the ordinary maintenance of the Navy, but believed to be of pressing importance at this time. It would, in my opinion, be wise at once to afford sufficient means for the immediate completion of the five double-turreted monitors now undergoing repairs, which must otherwise advance slowly and only as money can be spared from current expenses. Supplemented by these, our Navy, armed with the destructive weapons of modern warfare, manned by our seamen, and in charge of our instructed officers, will present a force powerful for the home purposes of a responsible though peaceful nation.

The report of the Postmaster-General, herewith transmitted, gives a full history of the workings of the Department for the year just passed. It will be observed that the deficiency to be supplied from the general Treasury increased over the amount required for the preceding year. In a country so vast in area as the United States, with large portions sparsely settled, it must be expected that this important service will be more or less a burden upon the Treasury for many years to come. But there is no branch of the public service which interests the whole people more than that of cheap and rapid transmission of the mails to every inhabited part of our territory. Next to the free school the post-office is the great educator of the people, and it may well receive the support of the General Government.

The subsidy of $150,000 per annum given to vessels of the United States for carrying the mails between New York and Rio de Janeiro having ceased on the 30th day of September last, we are without direct mail facilities with the South American states. This is greatly to be regretted, and I do not hesitate to recommend the authorization of a renewal of that contract, and also that the service may be increased from monthly to semi-monthly trips. The commercial advantages to be gained by a direct line of American steamers to the South American states will far outweigh the expense of the service.

By act of Congress approved March 3, 1875, almost all matter, whether properly mail matter or not, may be sent any distance through the mails, in packages not exceeding four pounds in weight, for the sum of sixteen cents per pound. So far as the transmission of real mail matter goes, this would seem entirely proper. But I suggest that the law be so amended as to exclude from the mails merchandise of all descriptions, and limit this transportation to articles enumerated, and which may be classed as mail matter proper.

The discovery of gold in the Black Hills, a portion of the Sioux reservation, has had the effect to induce a large emigration of miners to that point. Thus far the effort to protect the treaty rights of the Indians to that section has been successful, but the next year will certainly witness a large increase of such emigration. The negotiations for the relinquishment of the gold fields having failed, it will be necessary for Congress to adopt some measures to relieve the embarrassment growing out of the causes named. The Secretary of the Interior suggests that the supplies now appropriated for the sustenance of that people, being no longer obligatory, under the treaty of 1868, but simply a gratuity, may be issued or withheld at his discretion.

The condition of the Indian Territory, to which I have referred in several of my former annual messages, remains practically unchanged. The Secretary of the Interior has taken measures to obtain a full report of the condition of that Territory, and will make it the subject of a special report at an early day. It may then be necessary to make some further recommendation in regard to legislation for the government of that Territory.

The steady growth and increase of the business of the Patent Office indicates in some measure the progress of the industrial activity of the country. The receipts of the office are in excess of its expenditures, and the office generally is in a prosperous and satisfactory condition.

The report of the General Land Office shows that there were 2,459,601 acres less disposed of during this than during the last year. More than one-half of this decrease was in lands disposed of under the homestead and timber-culture laws. The cause of this decrease is supposed to be found in the grasshopper scourge and the droughts, which prevailed so extensively in some of the frontier States and Territories during that time as to discourage and deter entries by actual settlers.

The cash receipts were less by $690,322.23 than during the preceding year.

The entire surveyed area of the public domain is 680,253,094 acres, of which 26,077,531 acres were surveyed during the past year, leaving 1,154,471,762 acres still unsurveyed.

The report of the Commissioner presents many interesting suggestions in regard to the management and disposition of the public domain and the modification of existing laws, the apparent importance of which should insure for them the careful consideration of Congress.

The number of pensioners still continues to decrease, the highest number having been reached during the year ending June 30, 1873. During the last year 11,557 names were added to the rolls and 12,977 were dropped therefrom, showing a net decrease of 1,420. But, while the number of pensioners has decreased, the annual amount due on the pension rolls has increased $44,733.13. This is caused by the greatly increased average rate of pensions, which, by the liberal legislation of Congress, has increased from $90.26 in 1872 to $103.91 in 1875 to each invalid pensioner, an increase in the average rate of 15 per cent. in the three years.

During the year ending June 30, 1875, there was paid on account of pensions, including the expenses of disbursement, $29,683,116, being $910,632 less than was paid the preceding year. This reduction in amount of expenditures was produced by the decrease in the amount of arrearages due on allowed claims, and on pensions, the rate of which was increased by the legislation of the preceding session of Congress. At the close of the last fiscal year there were on the pension-rolls 234,821 persons, of whom 210,363 were Army pensioners, 105,478 being invalids, and 104,885 widows and dependent relatives; 3,420 were Navy pensioners, of whom 1,636 were invalids, and 1,784 widows and dependent relatives; 21,038 were pensioners of the war of 1812, 15,875 of whom were survivors, and 5,163 were widows. It is estimated that $29,535,000 will be required for the payment of pensions for the next fiscal year, an amount $965,000 less than the estimate for the present year.

The geological explorations have been prosecuted with energy during the year, covering an area of about forty thousand square miles in the Territories of Colorado, Utah, and New Mexico, developing the agricultural and mineral resources and furnishing interesting scientific and topographical details of that region.

The method for the treatment of the Indians adopted at the beginning of my first term has been steadily pursued, and with satisfactory and encouraging results. It has been productive of evident improvement in the condition of that race, and will be continued with only such modifications as further experience may indicate to be necessary.

The board heretofore appointed to take charge of the articles and materials pertaining to the War, the Navy, the Treasury, the Interior, and the Post-Office Departments, and the Department of Agriculture, the Smithsonian Institution, and the Commission of Food Fishes, to be contributed, under the legislation of last session, to the international exhibition to be held at Philadelphia during the centennial year 1876, has been diligent in the discharge of the duties which have devolved upon it; and the preparations so far made with the means at command give assurance that the governmental contribution will be made one of the marked characteristics of the exhibition. The board has observed commendable economy in the matter of the erection of a building for the governmental exhibit, the expense of which, it is estimated, will not exceed, say, $80,000. This amount has been withdrawn, under the law, from the appropriations of five of the principal Departments, which leaves some of those Departments without sufficient means to render their respective practical exhibits complete and satisfactory. The exhibition being an international one, and the Government being a voluntary contributor, it is my opinion that its contribution should be of a character, in quality and extent, to sustain the dignity and credit of so distinguished a contributor. The advantages to the country of a creditable display are, in an international point of view, of the first importance, while an indifferent or uncreditable participation by the Government would be humiliating to the patriotic feelings of our people themselves. I commend the estimates of the board for the necessary additional appropriations to the favorable consideration of Congress.

The powers of Europe, almost without exception, many of the South American states, and even the more distant Eastern powers have manifested their friendly sentiments toward the United States and the interest of the world in our progress by taking steps to join with us in celebrating the centennial of the Nation, and I strongly recommend that a more national importance be given this exhibition by such legislation and such appropriation as will insure its success. Its value in bringing to our shores innumerable useful works of art and skill, the commingling of the citizens of foreign countries and our own, and the interchange of ideas and manufactures will far exceed any pecuniary outlay we may make.

I transmit herewith the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture, together with the reports of the commissioners, the board of audit, and the board of health of the District of Columbia, to all of which I invite your attention. The Bureau of Agriculture has accomplished much in disseminating useful knowledge to the agriculturist, and also in introducing new and useful productions adapted to our soil and climate, and is worthy of the continued encouragement of the Government.

The report of the Commissioner of Education, which accompanies the report of the Secretary of the Interior, shows a gratifying progress in educational matters.

In nearly every annual message that I have had the honor of transmitting to Congress I have called attention to the anomalous, not to say scandalous, condition of affairs existing in the Territory of Utah, and have asked for definite legislation to correct it. That polygamy should exist in a free, enlightened, and Christian country without the power to punish so flagrant a crime against decency and morality seems preposterous. True, there is no law to sustain this unnatural vice, but what is needed is a law to punish it as a crime, and at the same time to fix the status of the innocent children, the offspring of this system, and of the possibly innocent plural wives. But as an institution polygamy should be banished from the land. While this is being done I invite the attention of Congress to another, though perhaps no less an evil—the importation of Chinese women, but few of whom are brought to our shores to pursue honorable or useful occupations.

Observations while visiting the Territories of Wyoming, Utah, and Colorado, during the past autumn, convinced me that existing laws regulating the disposition of public lands, timber, &c., and probably the mining laws themselves, are very defective, and should be carefully amended, and at an early day. In territory where cultivation of the soil can only be followed by irrigation, and where irrigation is not practicable the lands can only be used as pasturage, and this only where stock can reach water, (to quench its thirst,) cannot be governed by the same laws as to entries as lands every acre of which is an independent estate by itself. Land must be held in larger quantities to justify the expense of conducting water upon it to make it fruitful, or to justify utilizing it as pasturage. The timber in most of the Territories is principally confined to the mountain regions, which are held for entry in small quantities only, and as mineral lands. The timber is the property of the United States, for the disposal of which there is now no adequate law. The settler must become a consumer of this timber whether he lives upon the plain or engages in working the mines. Hence every man becomes either a trespasser himself, or, knowingly, a patron of trespassers.

My opportunities for observation were not sufficient to justify me in recommending specific legislation on these subjects, but I do recommend that a joint committee of the two Houses of Congress—sufficiently large to be divided into sub-committees—be organized to visit all the mining States and Territories during the coming summer, and that the committee shall report to Congress at the next session such laws or amendments to laws as it may deem necessary to secure the best interests of the Government and the people of these Territories who are doing so much for their development. I am sure the citizens occupying the territory described do not wish to be trespassers, nor will they be if legal ways are provided for them to become owners of these actual necessities of their position.

As this will be the last annual message which I shall have the honor of transmitting to Congress before my successor is chosen, I will repeat or recapitulate the questions which I deem of vital importance, which may be legislated upon and settled at this session.

First. That the States shall be required to afford the opportunity of a good common-school education to every child within their limits.

Second. No sectarian tenets shall ever be taught in any school supported in whole or in part by the State, nation, or by the proceeds of any tax levied upon any community. Make education compulsory so far as to deprive all persons who cannot read and write from becoming voters after the year 1890—disfranchising none, however, on grounds of illiteracy, who may be voters at the time this amendment takes effect.

Third. Declare church and state forever separate and distinct, but each free within its proper sphere, and that all church property shall bear its own proportion of taxation.

Fourth. Drive out licensed immorality, such as polygamy and the importation of women for illegitimate purposes. To recur again to the centennial year: it would seem as though now, as we are about to begin the second century of our national existence, would be a most fitting time for these reforms.

Fifth. Enact such laws as will insure a speedy return to a sound currency, such as will command the respect of the world.

Believing that these views will commend themselves to the great majority of the right-thinking and patriotic citizens of the United States, I submit the rest to Congress.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, December 7, 1875.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I move that the message lie on the table and be printed; and I move also the customary resolution for the printing of extra copies, to go to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order for printing the message will be made, if there be no objection. The motion to print extra copies will lie on the table, to be referred to the Committee on Printing when appointed. The documents accompanying the message will also be submitted, and lie on the table, and be printed, if there be no objection. The Chair hears no objection.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting his annual report on the state of the finances; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating, in obedience to law, a complete inventory of all property belonging to the United States in the Department of the Interior November 30, 1875; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Comptroller of the Currency, transmitting his thirteenth annual report; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Senate, submitting, in obedience to law, a full and complete account of all property belonging to the United States in his possession to the present date; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Senate, transmitting a statement of the receipts and expenditures of the contingent fund of the Senate from July 1, 1874, to June 30, 1875; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, transmitting, in obedience to law, a statement of property belonging to the United States in his possession to the present date; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the clerk of the Court of Claims, communicating, in obedience to law, a statement of all judgments rendered by that court for the year ending December 6, 1875, the amounts thereof, the parties in whose favor rendered, and a brief synopsis of the nature of the claims upon which said judgments have been rendered; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at two o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 7, 1875.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND, Chaplain of the House, offered the following prayer:

The Lord be with you. Let us pray. Our Father, who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive those who trespass against us. And lead us not into temptation; but deliver us from evil: for Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever and ever. Amen.

O Lord, our heavenly Father, the high and mighty Ruler of the universe, who dost from Thy throne behold all the dwellers upon earth; most heartily we beseech Thee with Thy favor to behold and bless Thy servant the President of the United States, and all others in authority; and so replenish them with the grace of Thy Holy Spirit, that they may always incline to Thy will, and walk in Thy way. Endue them plenteously with heavenly gifts; grant them in health and prosperity long to live; and finally, after this life, to attain everlasting joy and felicity; through Jesus Christ our Lord.

Most gracious God, we humbly beseech Thee, as for the people of these United States in general, so especially for their Senate and Representatives in Congress assembled; that Thou wouldest be pleased to direct and prosper all their consultations to the advancement of Thy glory, the good of Thy church, the safety, honor, and welfare of Thy people; that all things may be so ordered and settled by their endeavors, upon the best and surest foundations, that peace and happiness, truth and justice, religion and piety, may be established among us for all generations. These and all other necessaries, for them, for us, and Thy whole church, we humbly beg in the name and mediation of Jesus Christ, our most blessed Lord and Savior.

Direct us, Lord, in all our doings with Thy most gracious favor, and further us with Thy continual help, that in all our works, begun, continued, and ended in Thee, we may glorify Thy holy name, and finally by Thy mercy obtain everlasting life; through Jesus Christ our Lord.

The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost, be with us all evermore. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House take a recess until one o'clock, the hour fixed for the drawing of seats.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me for one moment? I desire, with the permission of the House, to make a brief personal explanation.

Mr. RANDALL. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BLAINE. I will not take over a minute. In the debate yesterday, the notes of which, except the earlier part of it, I did not have an opportunity to revise, I am reported as using this language:

> And that they will in an incidental way of this kind attempt to reopen and dishonor the agreement that was made last year.

I was speaking in reply to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] and some gentlemen have imagined that the word "dishonor" was used with some desire or design to direct it to that gentleman as a personal affront. I used it only in the sense of "nullify" and "disregard," as we often speak of paper being dishonored when it is not paid. I had not the remotest idea of offering an affront to the gentleman from Mississippi, who certainly knows that if our relations have not been intimate they have been none other than entirely cordial at all times; and it would be the furthest from my desire at any time to say anything to him that would be wounding or otherwise disagreeable to his feelings.

Mr. LAMAR. I desire to say just a single word.

The SPEAKER. Does the House consent to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

Several MEMBERS. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman from Mississippi will proceed.

Mr. LAMAR. I did not hear yesterday the word which the gentleman from Maine is reported as having used. Had I heard it, I would have felt assured that it had inadvertently dropped from his lips in the heat of debate; for I believe him incapable of personal discourtesy to myself or any other gentleman. To the kindly sentiments which he has just expressed I respond with unfeigned cordiality.

MEMBER SWORN IN.

Mr. ADDISON OLIVER, Representative-elect of the ninth district of Iowa, appeared at the bar and qualified by taking the oath prescribed by the law of July 2, 1862.

VIRGINIA CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. RANDALL. I now insist on my motion that the House take a recess until one o'clock.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman yield to me to make a request in regard to the printing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the memorial of Mr. James H. Platt, jr., contestant from the second district of Virginia? The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRIS] desired yesterday to have it printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. It was the understanding of the Chair yesterday that that order was made, and if there be no objection it will be regarded as having been made.

There was no objection.

The memorial is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 6, 1875.

To the House of Representatives of the United States of America:

I, James H. Platt, jr., of Virginia, deny the right and title of John Goode, jr., to take his seat in the House of Representatives of the Forty-fourth Congress of the United States, as Representative from the second congressional district of Virginia, upon the following grounds. I allege:

1. That the certificate which he holds as prima facie evidence of his right and title to the seat aforesaid is without authority of law, and is not supported by any record evidence, and is contradicted by the oath of the secretary of the Commonwealth, James McDonald, himself, who signed said certificate and caused the same to be delivered to said Goode.

2. That said certificate could not be lawfully executed and issued by the secretary of the Commonwealth alone without a statement of the whole number of votes given in the election in said second congressional district for a Representative therefrom, nor without an ascertainment and determination by the board of State canvassers as to the whole number of votes cast, and the name of the person who had received the greatest number of the votes given in said election.

3. The statement of the whole number of votes cast in the counties and corporations forming said congressional district in an election for a Representative in the Congress of the United States, held pursuant to law on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November, 1874, was made out to the said board of canvassers and laid before them on the 23d day of November, 1874, and the said board certified the said statement to be correct, to wit:

Statement of the whole number of votes cast in the counties and corporations forming the second congressional district of Virginia in an election for a Representative in the Congress of the United States, held, pursuant to law, the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November, 1874:

"JAS. McDONALD, Secretary of the Commonwealth.
"WM. F. TAYLOR, Auditor of Public Accounts.
"R. M. T. HUNTER, State Treasurer.
"R. T. DANIEL, Attorney-General."

And the said paper is without date.

4. The original of the foregoing paper shows on its face that in the county of Prince George James H. Platt, jr., received 987 votes and that John Goode, jr., received 562; and that the whole number of votes cast in said election in the whole district for a Representative in Congress was 14,377 for James H. Platt, jr., and 14,083 for John Goode, jr., 444 for Robert Norton, and 1 for Joseph H. Platt.

5. That said original statement was as to the returns from said county of Prince George erased; how or by what order does not appear in any record, except by a marginal entry on said statement, written on the face of the paper and marked at "Prince George" with an asterisk, in these words, to wit: "Not counted, because of informality."

6. That another paper was laid before the said board of State convassers on the 23d day of November, 1874, in the words and figures following, to wit:

[Copy II.]

"Abstract of votes of the election held in the county of Prince George on the 3d day of November, 1874, for a Representative from the second congressional district of Virginia in the Forty-fourth Congress of the United States of America.

"James H. Platt, jr., received 987 votes.

"John Goode, jr., received 562 votes.

"Given under our hands this 5th day of November, 1874.

"T. A. LEATH,
"WM. D. TEMPLE,
"CHARLES T. ROBERTSON,
"Commissioners.

"STATE OF VIRGINIA,
"County of Prince George, to wit:

"I, Robert Gilliam, sr., clerk of the county court of Prince George, in the State of Virginia, do certify the foregoing to be a true copy of the return of the election for a Representative from the second congressional district of Virginia to the Forty-fourth Congress of the United States.

"In testimony whereof I hereto set my hand and affixed the seal of the said court, this 5th day of November, A. D. 1874, and in the ninety-ninth year of the independence of the United States.

[SEAL.] "RO. GILLIAM, SR., Clerk."

7. A third paper was found among the files of the said board of State canvassers which on its face shows that it appears by the returns made to the secretary of the Commonwealth that 14,377 votes were given for James H. Platt, jr., and 14,083 were given for John Goode, jr., giving to James H. Platt, jr., a majority of 294 votes in said district; but the board rejected the return made by the commissioners of election in Prince George county, and thus the votes were made to stand for James H. Platt, jr., 13,390, and for John Goode, jr., 13,521 votes, making a majority of 131 votes for said Goode. But this paper was not entered in any order or minutes of said board, and was not signed by said canvassers, and has no validity whatever as a statement and determination by said board, such as are required by the laws of Virginia.

8. The three papers above named and cited are the only papers touching the said election in said district produced and furnished in whole or in part by the secretary of the Commonwealth or by said board of State canvassers as existing on the 23d day of November, 1874; and they show on their face a mutilation of the original returns made to the secretary of the Commonwealth, by the erasure of the returns from Prince George County; and there was no ascertainment and determination of the board as to who received the greatest number of the votes given in said election for Representative as aforesaid.

9. That the said board of State canvassers, after having met and proceeded as before stated on the fourth Monday, the 23d day of November, 1874, adjourned, and never afterward assembled as a board in pursuance of law; and they have never made any determination as to who received the greatest number of votes at said election. They made and recorded no such determination at the time and place appointed by law; and on the 23d day of November aforesaid left the certificate of determination blank, not filled with the name of either James H. Platt, jr., or of John Goode, jr.

10. That afterward, to wit, on the 25th day of November, 1874, the secretary of the Commonwealth, James McDonald, being ex officio a member of the board of State canvassers, while said board was not in session and had not met according to law after its adjournment on the 23d day of November, did cause his clerk, William E. Binford, to take the following paper—

"COMMONWEALTH OF VIRGINIA,
"Office Secretary of Commonwealth.

"We, the undersigned, a board of State canvassers, created by an act of the General Assembly, do hereby certify that at a meeting held pursuant to law, at the office of the secretary of the Commonwealth, the fourth Monday in November, 1874, having examined the certified abstract, on file in that office, of votes given in the counties and corporations forming the second congressional district, at an election held the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November, 1874, for a Representative in the Congress of the United States, and having made statement of the whole number of votes so given, we ascertain and determine that John Goode, jr., having received the greatest number of votes cast in said election, was duly elected a Representative in the Congress of the United States from the second district of Virginia for the term prescribed by law.

"Given under our hands at Richmond, Virginia, this 23d day of November, 1874.

"J. L. KEMPER, Governor,
"JAS. McDONALD, Secretary of the Commonwealth.
"WM. F. TAYLOR, Auditor of Public Accounts.
"R. M. T. HUNTER, State Treasurer.
"R. T. DANIEL, Attorney-General."

around to J. L. Kemper, governor; William F. Taylor, auditor of public accounts; R. M. T. Hunter, State treasurer, and to R. T. Daniel, attorney-general, when not in session as a board of State canvassers, and obtained their individual signatures to said paper apart from each other, while the said paper was in blank as to the name of the person who, "having received the greatest number of votes cast in said election, was duly elected a Representative" as aforesaid.

11. That the said James McDonald, after having obtained said signatures to said paper in blank as aforesaid, caused the said William E. Binford, on the 25th day of November, 1874, to insert in the blank space in said paper the name of John Goode, jr., without any order, resolution, or determination of said board of canvassers.

12. That said paper is false and fraudulent, in this:

First. It was not done at any meeting of the board of State canvassers held in pursuance of law.

Second. It was not done and executed on the fourth Monday in November, 1874, the day specially prescribed by law for the performance of such duty.

Third. The said board did not on that day, the 23d day of November, or at any other time, make statement of the whole number of votes given in said election.

Fourth. The said board have never ascertained that John Goode, jr., received the greatest number of the votes cast in said election, and have never determined that he was duly elected a Representative in the Congress of the United States from the second congressional district of Virginia as the law prescribes.

Fifth. Said paper, marked "Indorsement on Copy III," was signed, done, and executed on the 25th day of November, 1874, by the procurement of said James McDonald, through his clerk, as aforesaid, and was antedated as of the 23d day of November, 1874.

Sixth. It was not signed, done, and executed at the office of the secretary of the Commonwealth on the 23d day of November, 1874, (or on any other day,) as required by law, and as therein alleged.

13. Your petitioner refers to no evidence besides what is contained on the face of the record except the depositions under oath of the aforesaid James McDonald and his clerk, William E. Binford, lawfully taken after notice to Mr. Goode, and chiefly in his presence, and duly returned under seal to the Clerk of this House, which depositions I respectfully ask the House to have opened and read by the Clerk from his desk, to prove the facts herein alleged.

14. For further prima facie evidence to show how the official papers in this case have been tampered with, I respectfully ask the House to read and inspect the certificate of election now in the hands of Mr. Goode, to test whether the date has not been changed from the 23d to the 25th day of November, 1874.

For the reasons above set forth, some of which have come to my knowledge since my notice of contest was served, and during the taking of the depositions, I respectfully insist that the pretended "certificate of election" held by Mr. Goode is unlawful, null, and void, and of no effect, to all intents and purposes as fully as if the same were a forgery; that it was in fact an act of usurpation on the part of the secretary of the Commonwealth and an improper use of the seal of his office, and that it does not even prima facie confer upon Mr. Goode any right or title whatsoever to a seat in this House as a Representative.

Therefore I respectfully ask the House to refuse to permit Mr. Goode to be sworn in as a Representative, and to refer his credentials to the Committee on Elections, so that his prima facie right to a seat in this House may be speedily decided.

Respectfully,

JAMES H. PLATT, JR.

RECESS.

The motion of Mr. RANDALL was agreed to; and accordingly (at twelve o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until one o'clock p. m.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at one o'clock p. m.

DRAWING FOR SEATS.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest to the Speaker that the floor be cleared, and left exclusively to those who are entitled to draw seats as members of the House.

The SPEAKER. That is precisely what the Chair desires to accomplish. It is very necessary to the orderly transaction of business that the floor be cleared of those who are not entitled to it. The Chair directs the Doorkeeper to see to it that all gentlemen who are not entitled to the privileges of the floor retire from the Hall at this time.

Mr. CLYMER. I ask unanimous consent that Hon. Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia, be permitted to select his seat without reference to the drawing. His infirmities of health are such as are known to every member who served in the last Congress.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I suggest that he be allowed to occupy the seat that he occupied in the last Congress.

Mr. CLYMER. I would say to the gentleman from California that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Stephens] does not desire to occupy the same seat.

The SPEAKER. It is suggested that the honorable member from Georgia [Mr. Stephens] have his seat selected for him. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. There are three members of the House absent on a special committee to wait upon the President of the United States, and I submit that it would be unfair to those gentlemen to allow the drawing for seats to go on in their absence, without allowing them an opportunity to select their seats. I hope an exception will be made in their case.

The SPEAKER. What is the motion that the gentlemen submits?

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I will move that the drawing be delayed for ten minutes. [Cries of "Object!" "Object!"] I suggest, then, that the lobby be cleared of all persons not entitled to the privileges of the floor.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I suggest that, in the case of these gentlemen, who are absent by order of the House, the Doorkeeper be authorized to select their seats for them.

Mr. GARFIELD. The Doorkeeper cannot know their wishes in regard to seats.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I was one of those who objected to a delay. I desire now to withdraw that objection.

The SPEAKER. Does any one object to delay in the drawing for ten minutes? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MAISH. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. Egbert, was called home last evening by a death in his family, and I ask unanimous consent that leave be granted for a drawing of a seat for him by one of his colleagues.

There was no objection, and the leave was granted.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I make the same request in behalf of my colleague from Kentucky, Mr. DURHAM, who has been called home by the telegraphic announcement of the sickness of his wife. I ask unanimous consent that one of his colleagues be permitted to select a seat for him.

There was no objection, and the leave was granted.

Mr. SAYLER. I ask unanimous consent that the usual courtesy be extended to the member who has served longest continuously here, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] that he be allowed to select his seat before the drawing commences.

No objection was made, and the leave was granted; and Mr. KELLEY thereupon selected his seat.

The SPEAKER. A few minutes ago the Chair believes that it was understood by the House that that portion of the House outside of the bar should be absolutely cleared. There are some gentlemen here who under the regular rules of the House are entitled to admission upon the floor. Is it the intention of the House that during the selection of seats the rule entitling those gentlemen to admission shall be suspended?

Mr. RANDALL. That is the intention I had.

The SPEAKER. Then, no objection being made, the Hall will be cleared of all those not entitled to admission as members, during the drawing.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. COX. The committee appointed to wait upon the President, and inform him that the House is organized and is ready to receive any communication he may desire to make, have discharged that duty, and report that the President states that he will send a message in writing forthwith to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair then asks whether it is the pleasure of the House that the drawing for seats shall be delayed until the message from the President shall be received and read. [Loud cries of "No!" "No!"] Then the drawing will proceed.

DRAWING FOR SEATS.

The Members and Delegates, in accordance with the resolution of the House, retired beyond the outer row of seats, and as their names were drawn came forward and selected their seats, the first name drawn being that of Mr. JOHN O. WHITEHOUSE, of New York, and the last, (at two o'clock and twenty-three minutes p. m.,) that of Mr. HENRY R. HARRIS, of Georgia.

ANNUAL MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT.

The annual message of the President of the United States, with accompanying documents, was then delivered to the House by LEVI P. LUCKEY, his Private Secretary.

The SPEAKER. The message of the President will be now read.

The message was then read.

[It will be found in the proceedings of the Senate.]

After the message, Mr. RANDALL submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the annual message of the President and accompanying documents be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and printed.

Mr. HOAR. Allow me to make one suggestion in regard to printing the message in the RECORD; that is, that the House direct that it shall be printed but once.

Mr. RANDALL. I cannot yield for that purpose now.

Mr. BANKS. Allow me to offer this resolution:

Resolved, That the message of the President of the United States and the reports of the several Secretaries of the Executive Departments of the Government be printed in pamphlet form for the use of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I would prefer not to have that resolution submitted until we can know exactly what the cost would be.

Mr. BANKS. It provides only for the usual number of copies, not for extra copies. These copies can be put upon the desks of members to-morrow morning, and we will not get them in the ordinary course of printing for many weeks. These documents embrace the whole operations of the Government, and I think the usual number of copies is not over twelve hundred.

Mr. RANDALL. I prefer not to yield for such a resolution at this time.

The question was upon adopting the resolution submitted by Mr. RANDALL, and being taken, the resolution was adopted.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I also submit the following resolution; which I believe goes under the law to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That 20,000 extra copies of the message and accompanying documents be printed.

The resolution was received and referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BANKS. I now ask permission to submit the resolution I indicated a few moments since, with a modification to restrict it to the usual number of copies.

The resolution, as modified, was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the usual number of copies of the message of the President of the United States and the reports of the several Secretaries of the Executive Departments of the Government be printed in pamphlet form for the use of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I would inquire whether, under the law, this resolution should not be referred to the Committee on Printing?

The SPEAKER. In the judgment of the Chair it should be so referred.

Mr. BANKS. It does not provide for printing any extra copies; only the usual number.

Mr. RANDALL. We have already adopted a resolution which provides for printing the usual number of copies.

Mr. BANKS. We want these reports in order that we may fully comprehend the operations of the Government. In the ordinary course of printing documents we will not have them for weeks. If my resolution shall be adopted we will have them on our tables to-morrow or next day.

Mr. RANDALL. We already have the most of them in this form. [Holding up a pamphlet.]

Mr. BANKS. We do not get them all in that way.

The SPEAKER. In the judgment of the Chair this resolution, under the law, must go to the Committee on Printing.

The resolution was accordingly ordered to be referred to the Committee on Printing, when appointed.

THIRD CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. COX. I beg leave to present a resolution which pertains to the organization and constitution of this House.

The SPEAKER. To what does it relate?

Mr. COX. It relates to the right of representation of the congressional districts of South Carolina, and I want the Committee on Elections to pass upon it.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the memorial of William Henry Trescot, with reference to the right of representation from the third congressional district of South Carolina, be referred to the Committee on Elections when appointed, with instructions to examine and report thereon.

Mr. COX. By act of Congress it is required that congressional districts shall consist of contiguous territory. The Legislature of South Carolina have made a district in that State, for certain purposes which it is not now necessary to state, not of contiguous territory. The question raised by this memorial is not so much in relation to the right of the Representative from that district, for he was sworn in yesterday on the prima facie case, but it relates to the right of representation. I ask, on behalf of the memorialist and the people of South Carolina, that that question be considered by the Committee on Elections. If no one objects to the resolution, I will now call the previous question upon it.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] whether it would not be better to refer this resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary when appointed.

Mr. COX. No, sir.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The Committee on Elections is organized of course to hear contested elections; but this question is a purely legal or constitutional one, and it seems to me would more appropriately go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COX. This question is a larger one than the gentleman supposes. It involves the right of representation. We have undertaken to pass here, by the gentleman's aid, a law whereby this temporary and miserable system of gerrymandering was to be suppressed. The Legislature of South Carolina ignored our law. I want to know whether or not a man can come here as a member from a district which is no district—which has no right of representation whatever.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is a question which may well come up at a later day much more appropriately than now. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Friday next.

Mr. COX. I do not yield for that purpose. I want this matter referred to the Committee on Elections. What objection can my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] have to that course?

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no possible objection to it; but it is a subject which would more appropriately come up after we are more fully organized for the transaction of business.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] desire longer to debate this question?

Mr. COX. No, sir, I do not. I ask for a vote. If the House chooses to vote down the resolution, let it do so.

The SPEAKER. Then the motion of the gentleman from Indiana is in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw that motion until this question is disposed of.

The resolution of Mr. COX was adopted.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent that the memorial of Mr. Trescot be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The memorial is as follows:

To the honorable the House of Representatives of the United States of America:

This memorial of the undersigned, William Henry Trescot, a citizen of South Carolina and a resident and voter in the third congressional district of the said State, respectfully showeth:

1. That by an act approved ——, 1872, and entitled "An act for the apportionment of Representatives to Congress among the several States according to the ninth census," it was enacted—

"That, from and after the 3d day of March, 1873, the House of Representatives shall be composed of two hundred and eighty-three members, to be apportioned among the several States in accordance with the provisions of this act, that is to say:

* * * * * * *

To the State of South Carolina five.

* * * * * * *

2. That by the second section of said act it was further enacted—

"That in each State entitled under the law to more than one Representative the number to which said State may be entitled in the Forty-third and each subsequent Congress shall be elected by districts, composed of contiguous territory, and containing as nearly as practicable an equal number of inhabitants, and equal in number to the number of Representatives to which said State may be entitled in Congress, no one district electing more than one Representative.

3. That in pursuance of this act the General Assembly of the State of South Carolina, upon the 3d of March, 1874, passed an act entitled "An act to divide the State into five congressional districts," by which it enacted—

"That the State of South Carolina shall be, and the same is hereby, divided into five congressional districts, as follows, to wit:

* * * * * * *

The third congressional district to be composed of the counties of Richland, Newberry, Abbeville, Laurens, Anderson, Oconee, and Pickens.

* * * * * * *"

4. That the said "third congressional district" is not, as required by the aforesaid act of Congress, "composed of contiguous territory," but that in palpable and intentional violation of said act the county of Richland, which (the capital of the State being situate therein) is in point of numbers and influence the most important county in the said district, is not contiguous to any portion of the other counties composing the said third congressional district, but is separated from them by counties forming portions of other congressional districts, as will more clearly appear by the map hereunto annexed.

5. That the third congressional district is therefore illegally constituted, and not entitled to representation.

6. The object of the act of Congress was to establish a sound and general public policy, by which the manipulation of congressional representation in the interest of temporary and varying partisan politics should be forever and everywhere prevented. If the State of South Carolina is allowed to defeat this policy by contemptuous disregard of a plain and explicit law, no other State can be required to obey it; and thus a wise and wholesome law will be practically repealed.

7. For this open violation of a supreme law of the land by a legislative body, whose character and office should make them especially the guardians of law, there is no remedy, except through the interposition of your honorable body, whose authority has been denied, whose will has been disregarded, and whose patriotic policy has been defeated by this action of the Legislature of the State.

8. And your memorialist therefore prays that your honorable body will, in the exercise of your undoubted constitutional power and in the discharge of your duty to the citizens of South Carolina declare that the third congressional district of that State is not entitled to representation until it is duly constituted according to the requirements of the act of Congress above recited.

Respectfully,

WILLIAM HENRY TRESCOT.

PRINTING OF PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to make a suggestion. I am credibly informed that the Senate has directed the printing of the President's message in the proceedings of that body. It is certainly unnecessary that it should appear also in the proceedings of the House; and this double publication would involve very considerable expense. I move, therefore, that the House reporters be directed to omit the President's message from the proceedings of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now renew my motion that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Friday next.

COMMITTEES OF THE SENATE.

Mr. WRIGHT. Before entering on the morning business, I trust I shall have unanimous consent to a motion I now make, that the Senate proceed to the appointment of its standing and other committees for the present session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to offer at this time a proposition relative to the formation of the committees.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

Mr. BAYARD. One word before the adoption of these resolutions. On behalf of the minority of the Senate, I desire to express our regret that upon the Committee on Finance, the number of which is nine members, we have not been allowed the same proportion which the sense of justice of the majority has given us upon the other committees. At this time, considering the importance of the duties of that committee, the number of the minority upon this floor, and their share of the public responsibility in molding the legislation of the country upon the subject intrusted to that committee, we consider the ratio deemed by the majority and ourselves a just one upon other committees should have prevailed especially upon this; but we also understand and we regret that in this case it was not adopted as in others. We understand, informally, however, that two of our colleagues, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] and the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] are detained from their seats, and that it is quite possible, or probable, indeed, as has been stated to us, that there will be an amendment on this subject, which, on behalf of the minority, I venture to express the hope may be made at as early a day as may be considered convenient.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolutions.

The resolutions were agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am not certain, upon the presentation of petitions, bills, and resolutions yesterday, that all of them were ordered to be referred to the appropriate committees when appointed. If there should be any such omission, I ask that the general order be made for reference to the appropriate committees.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To cover such cases, a general order will now be made for a reference to the appropriate committees of all petitions and other papers heretofore presented.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of State, transmitting, in obedience to law, a statement of the expenses attending the visit of the King of the Hawaiian Islands and suite to the United States; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of State, submitting, in obedience to law, a statement of fees collected and accounted for by various diplomatic and consular officers during the year ended December 31, 1874; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of State, transmitting, in obedience to law, a statement of consular officers, not citizens of the United States, to whom salaries were paid during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1875; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the First and Second Comptrollers of the Treasury, transmitting to Congress a certificate of board of audit for the District of Columbia in regard to the claim of William Bowen for abating certain nuisances; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the petition of John McFarland, late a private in Company E, Sixty-fourth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, praying for an honorable discharge from his enlistment in that regiment and for pay and allowances while a prisoner at Andersonville, Georgia; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CONKLING. I present the memorial of the Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company at New York, pointing out the injustice, as they deem it, of excluding insurance companies, and especially mutual insurance companies, from participation in the distribution of the Geneva award, and asking that such companies be subrogated to the rights of those whose losses they paid. I move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING presented the petition of the New York Mutual Insurance Company of New York, praying for the repeal of the twelfth section of the act creating a court for the adjudication of claims to moneys received by the United States for losses caused by the Alabama; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of Thomas W. Phelps, of New Brighton, New York, praying to be allowed a pension on account of blindness; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a resolution of the council of the Seneca Nation of New York Indians, in favor of an amendment of the act of February 19, 1875, authorizing the Seneca Nation of New York Indians to lease lands within the Cattaraugus and Allegany reservation, so as to cause all parties to conform thereto and to give to the courts power to enforce a compliance with the provisions thereof; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, presented the petition of Bayse N. Westcott, praying to be restored to active service in the Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented the petition of Benjamin Baker and other citizens of Key West, Florida, praying for a grant of land on the keys of Florida, as a partial reward to the said Baker for the introduction and cultivation of the pine-apple as an article of commerce; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented the petition of George S. Hawkins, of Jackson County, Florida, praying the removal of his political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MERRIMON presented a resolution of the Legislature of North Carolina, asking an amendment to the pension laws, so as to grant pensions to the widows of soldiers of the war of 1812 without regard to the time at which they were married; also that pensions be granted to soldiers of the Mexican war, and that pensions be granted to the widows of confederate soldiers and officers who served in the Army of the United States prior to the rebellion; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a memorial of E. J. Warren and other citizens of Beaufort County, North Carolina, praying for certain improvements in various rivers emptying into the Currituck and Albemarle Sounds, with a view to extend inland navigation from New York to Florida along the Atlantic coast; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MAXEY. I present a memorial of the delegates of the people of Texas, in constitutional convention assembled, in relation to depredations committed upon the people of the Rio Grande frontier by armed bands of marauders organized beyond the limits of the State. The memorial presents other matters growing out of the depredations, but the matter of immediate concern at this time is protection for the future. I move the reference of the paper to the Committee on Military Affairs, reserving the right to ask the reference of the residue of the memorial beyond the point I have stated to the appropriate committees upon the reception of a report from the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McCREERY presented the petition of Mrs. Eliza Smith, of Madison County, Kentucky, widow of the late John Speed Smith, an officer in the war of 1812, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BOUTWELL presented the petition of Isaac H. Fowler, of Dedham, in the county of Norfolk, Massachusetts, praying compensation for the destruction of buildings and fences on his farm in that county by United States troops in their occupation of it in 1864 and 1865; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of Marie Louise Perrin and Trautmann Perrin, praying compensation for destruction of their property by the bombardment of Greytown, Central America; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SARGENT. I present a petition of citizens of California, praying for the establishment of a fog-signal on the South Farallones Island, off San Francisco harbor, and suggest that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that that be referred to the Committee on Commerce. It should not go to the Committee on Appropriations. I noticed last session that new legislation of that kind was sometimes referred to the Committee on Appropriations. It seems to me those matters ought to go to the Committee on Commerce first, and then on their report to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SARGENT. The statement of the Senator as to the practice is by no means correct. The Committee on Appropriations for seven or eight years, to my knowledge, have taken jurisdiction of that kind of matter. They are in necessary correspondence with the Light-House Board, and refer all these matters to the board for report. The estimates of appropriations for new and old light-houses are all referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and reported by it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The statement of the Senator may be correct if it refers to the proceedings of the other House; I do not know about that; but in the Senate it has usually been the practice that the appropriate committee acts upon these measures; for instance, in regard to public buildings, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds first takes charge of all applications for the construction of public buildings; the Committee on Commerce, of all applications for light-houses, &c.; they act upon them, and then if their action is favorable they send them to the Committee on Appropriations to be included in the appropriation bills. Our rules are framed with that view. I trust that that course will be pursued in this instance, and I would say to the Senator from California that that was the course formerly adopted and followed, as I know, because I served for a long time upon the Committee on Finance when it had charge of the business now confided to the Committee on Appropriations. I think it would be a matter of convenience to the Committee on Appropriations that the respective committees should pass on these subjects of legislation and then refer them, under the rule, to the Committee on Appropriations, which they are bound to do. Indeed, the different committees cannot offer their amendments to the appropriation bills unless they be referred to the Committee on Appropriations; but we ought first to have the action of the respective committees upon these new items of appropriation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio make a motion?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SARGENT. I only desire that the usual course should be pursued in this matter. I am very well aware that during the last Congress the course I recommend was adopted. I know all these matters are directly passed upon by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom the estimates are referred. I prefer that this matter should go to the Committee on Appropriations as it has done before; but of course the Senate can decide it as it pleases.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio to refer the petition presented by the Senator from California to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I present the memorial of Major James T. Turner, praying the payment of a sum of money equal to the travel-pay of a captain of volunteers from Washington, District of Columbia, to San Francisco, California. This memorial at the last session of Congress was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and was favorably reported by them in the form of a bill which passed the Senate. I move that it be referred to the same committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS presented the petition of Celia C. Short, widow of Captain O. F. Short, late deputy United States surveyor, praying an appropriation of $10,000 as compensation for the loss of her husband and son who were killed by the Indians while surveying lands in Arkansas; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. WHYTE presented the petition of F. O. Wyse, late lieutenant-colonel Fourth United States Artillery, praying the passage of a special act restoring him to his former rank and position in the United States Army, and placing him on the retired list; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COOPER presented the petitions of book agents of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, praying compensation for the loss of property at Richmond, Virginia, and Louisville, Kentucky, during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

ate, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. No report was made in the case.

On motion of Mr. SAULSBURY, it was

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. ANTHONY, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CONKLING asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 45) to amend the act entitled "An act for the creation of a court for the adjudication and disposition of certain moneys received into the Treasury under an award made by the tribunal of arbitration constituted by virtue of the first article of the treaty concluded at Washington the 8th day of May, A. D. 1871, between the United States of America and the Queen of Great Britain," approved June 23, 1874; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 49) to confirm to the State of Florida the swamp and overflowed lands granted under the act of September 28, 1850; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 50) to amend the act entitled "An act to amend an act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 2, 1864; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 51) to organize the judicial district of Oklahoma, and to establish courts of the United States therein; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MODE OF PAYING CUSTOMS DUTIES.

Mr. BOGY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 57) authorizing the payment of duties on imports in legal-tender and national-bank notes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BOGY. I ask permission to explain the object of this bill, promising the Senate to consume but a minute or two of its time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection. The Senator from Missouri will proceed.

Mr. BOGY. The bill is really a very important one, and the subject presented by it will at some time no doubt lead to a great deal of discussion. It is not my intention at this time to discuss the merits of the bill. I only desire to state that at the first session of the last Congress I presented the measure and had it referred to the Committee on Finance, by whom it was reported upon adversely, and that at the second session I brought up the subject again in another way, but the effort did not meet with success. I renew the proposition now, believing honestly that it is the only way that we can ever attain what we all appear so much to desire, the day when specie payment will be resumed.

It may be considered by many that this is a measure tending to inflation. I wish it distinctly understood that that is not my intention. I look upon it as a measure tending to resumption, and in my humble opinion this is the only way that we can ever attain resumption.

Mr. MORTON. What is the proposition?

Mr. BOGY. The proposition is to receive legal-tenders and bank-notes in payment of duties on imports.

Mr. MORTON. All the duties?

Mr. BOGY. All the duties on imports. I say all, sir, because I think the measure to be efficacious must provide for receiving all. But, so as to prepare the country for this radical measure, I give timely notice. It is to go into operation only on the 4th of July next. I think the only way we can ever resume specie payment in this country is by appreciating the paper now in circulation. I am not for an increase of paper money. I believe that the amount of paper now in circulation is about the amount that the trade and commerce of the country require. I am not for an augmentation, although that, in the estimation of many persons, particularly in my section of country, is rather a popular idea. I am not for an increase of paper money. I wish to appreciate the paper that is now in circulation.

It will be observed that my bill provides that duties may be paid in national-bank notes equally as in legal-tenders, and for this simple reason: as long as we have national-bank notes in existence, whether the system under which they are issued be a wise one or not, it seems to me to be the duty of Congress to give to that paper as much value as possible. And then, again, as the Government is equally responsible for the payment of the national-bank notes as it is for the payment of the legal-tenders, there can be no reason why the Government should not receive the former in payment of all debts due to it.

It is not my intention at this time, as I stated at the outset, to argue at length this measure. I will take the occasion to do so at a proper time. I advance these opinions with a great deal of diffidence, because I do know that gentlemen on this floor of great ability and great experience entertain, I may say, different views. Nevertheless, I have thought on the subject a good deal; I have presented the subject before to the Senate; it has become a part of the political platform of my own State; and time and experience, since I have had the honor of a seat on this floor, concur in satisfying me that the measure is right; and, in my estimation, it is the only one which can lead to resumption of specie payments unless it be by unlimited contraction. It is true that if you contract the paper money, or, in other words, if you call it all in, resumption will take place; but the remedy would be infinitely worse than the disease. I desire to present a measure by which contraction will be avoided, because I look upon contraction as the ruin of the entire country. I desire the legal-tenders now in existence to remain, and whenever the wants of trade or of commerce may require an augmentation of circulation, it will be supplied naturally by the national banks. At the proper time, when this measure report; I am inclined to think the report will be adverse—I will take shall be reported back by the committee—and I have great fears of that occasion to speak more at length on the subject.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, of course I do not rise to discuss this subject at the present time; but after the statement of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BOGY,] which I have no doubt is an honest one, as he states himself, I deem it proper at least to make a counter-statement as to the probable effect of his proposed bill. The Senator seems to advocate the policy of receiving our customs duties in paper in order to avoid contraction and to promote a speedy return of specie payments. Why, Mr. President, it is perfectly obvious that the measure the Senator proposes would be one of contraction. It is not to increase the paper currency of the country, but it is at once to drive out of the country what little remnant of specie we now have. Of course, when we have no further use for any specie, it becomes merely a commodity to be exported, and it will certainly be exported the moment we have no longer any use for it at home.

Again, Mr. President, I do not know whether the Senator speaks in behalf of his party or not, but it is a proposition that comes from a distinguished Senator belonging to the other side of the Chamber, to do what? To violate the solemn pledge of the public faith that the customs duties, all of them, shall be collected in specie. That is the first proposition in relation to finance we have introduced into this Chamber, and it is to sweep out of existence the solemn pledges made at the time we first authorized the issue of the legal-tender currency.

Mr. President, there is another thing in relation to this matter. It is obvious to all of us that our revenues now are no more than sufficient, and indeed not even enough, to defray the annual expenses of the Government and to provide for the sinking fund to which we are pledged by law. What is this proposition? Why sir, it is to reduce the revenues at the rate at least of 14 per cent.—to diminish the amount of our resources by 14 per cent. certainly—amounting to not less than twenty or twenty-five millions; and if this proposition should prevail, very likely to reduce them 20 per cent. or 25 per cent.; for we do not know, after we strike away from this mooring, where our currency would land. The very salvation of the public credit of the country depends upon our observance of our plighted faith.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, I will not detain the Senate more than a moment, but I feel it due to the importance of the subject that a word of explanation should be said by me.

I repeat, sir, that my intention is to propose a measure which will lead to the resumption of specie payments and will not bring about contraction, and at the proper time I think the arguments advanced by the Senator from Vermont can be perfectly and satisfactorily answered.

He objects to the bill because it will amount to a virtual reduction of the duties by the amount of the premium on gold at the present day. If that premium remained, the argument of the Senator would be correct; but the logic of my bill is that this will bring up legal-tenders to the price of gold and that there will be no loss there.

Again, sir, he objects to it because it may be considered a violation of the plighted faith of this nation, given by former acts of Congress. I think that can be satisfactorily answered. I will introduce no measure, I will advocate no measure, as long as I retain a seat on this floor, which in any way, the remotest, will lower the credit of this nation or in any respect violate its plighted faith. I will do nothing of the kind. At a proper time I think that this measure can be explained and sustained as the only measure, among all the different measures which have been presented by the Executive and by the Treasury Department, and by Senators on this floor, which can by any possibility lead to the resumption of specie payments.

I will say one word further in answer to the Senator from Vermont. He suggested that I perhaps offered the bill which I have presented as a party measure. I wish it distinctly understood that I present it on my own responsibility. Party measures are offered generally by the leaders of the party. I have not the honor of being a leader. My leaders, although behind me, [pointing to the seats of some Senators in the outer row,] nevertheless speak for the party. I speak for myself individually. It is not a party measure at all.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Finance.

CUSTOM-HOUSE AT ROCKLAND, MAINE.

Mr. HAMLIN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be directed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell a small piece of land from the custom-house lot in Rockland, Maine.

AMENDMENT OF RULES.

Mr. MORTON. I offer the following resolution, and ask that it may be acted upon at this time if there be no objection:

Resolved, That the twenty-fifth rule of the Senate be so amended that bills may be introduced without previous notice unless objection is made, and that it shall not be necessary to state in the minutes that leave was given to introduce a bill without previous notice.

Mr. President, I desire to say a word. A considerable part of the minutes every morning is occupied with stating that Senators have asked and obtained unanimous consent to introduce bills without previous notice. I have never known but one occasion in the Senate when the introduction of a bill was objected to, and that was by a Senator from Kentucky not now a member of the body. It costs hundreds, perhaps thousands, of dollars every long session to print these formal words, "asked and obtained unanimous consent to introduce a bill without previous notice." We hear these words read in the minutes every morning till we are tired of them. Their repetition in the Journal takes time and costs money, and I hope there will be no objection to the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. THURMAN. I think the resolution had better go to the Committee on Rules.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore If there be no objection, that reference will be made.

Mr. MORTON. Very well.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

Mr. WEST. I present the petition of William L. McMillen, claimant to a seat in this body, and I ask that it be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 8, 1875.

To the honorable the President and members of the Senate of the United States:

The undersigned would respectfully ask permission to withdraw his credentials as Senator-elect by the McEnery legislature from the State of Louisiana.

Respectfully,

W. L. McMILLEN.

Mr. WEST. I have little doubt, Mr. President, but what the request of the gentleman who has indited that letter to the Senate will be granted. I understand from him that he has reasons for doing so which it would be quite agreeable to him to have the Senate listen to. They are expressed in a letter which is published in the morning papers, and if there be no objection I should like to have that letter read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

An open letter to "Governor" McEnery from "Senator" McMillen.

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 8, 1875.

Hon. JOHN MCENERY——

Mr. INGALLS. I object to that being read, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair asked the Senate for objection, and no objection was raised. The time to object has passed. The reading will proceed.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading, as follows:

Hon. JOHN MCENERY,
Governor-elect of Louisiana.

DEAR SIR: The political complications growing out of the general election of 1872 in Louisiana resulted, as you well know, in the formation of two legislative bodies, representing respectively the democratic, conservative, and liberal elements on the one part, and the radical republican on the other; the former body acting in conjunction with yourself as governor, and the latter with W. P. Kellogg.

As a sitting member of the State senate, although a republican, and yielding nothing of my convictions as such, my sympathies were in favor of the former body, as representing not only the popular will, but as giving the best guarantee for State reform and local self-government. This Assembly, at the extra session in December, 1872, did me the honor to elect me a Senator of the United States for the State of Louisiana, vice W. P. Kellogg, resigned. At the regular session in January they further honored me by an election as Senator for the term commencing March 4, 1873.

Accepting the trust imposed upon me and representing the will of the honorable body that elected me, I have appeared before the Senate of the United States in contest successively with Mr. John Ray for the unexpired term of W. P. Kellogg, and with Mr. Pinchback for the full term beginning March, 1873, and with such fidelity and efficiency as I could command have continued the contest to the present time.

Unlike ordinary rival claims to a seat in the Senate of the United States, this contest has directly involved the competency of the respective bodies represented by me and my opponents, as well as the title to office of the party giving each the credentials upon which the Senate has based its action—thus bringing in question the validity of the rival State governments of Louisiana. With so grave a problem at the foundation of this struggle involved, personal respect and fidelity to the people and body I represented forbade any abandonment of the contest so long as the issue between the respective claimants to executive power in Louisiana should be an open question. The Senate of the United States to date has held this question in abeyance, but, in my judgment, other and equally competent parties have practically and finally determined it.

In November, 1874, the successors to the General Assembly electing me were chosen, and after continued effort the difficulties in the way of organization of the Assembly were composed.

Under the auspices of a committee of congressmen, a plan of adjustment was agreed upon, the parties thereto embracing many of the gentlemen who honored me with their support in 1872-'73, and the settlement resulted in the formation of a General Assembly largely democratic and conservative in the lower house, and generally accepted as legitimate by both of the political parties of the State; and said Assembly, so constituted, at their extra session in April last, did formally recognize W. P. Kellogg as the executive of Louisiana. Further, the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, with a large democratic majority, following the action of the preceding republican House, did, on the 6th instant, recognize the final and determining action of the present Legislature of the State of Louisiana relative to the State government thereof by seating, prima facie, the six members of Congress elect from said State bearing the credentials of W. P. Kellogg, and refusing at the same time to recognize your competency to exercise executive functions for Louisiana.

The issues I represented having been thus substantially determined by parties and causes outside of and above my control, and the conservative people of the State and nation, through their representatives, having recognized the permanency of the existing State government, a further contest can have no practically beneficial result for the people of the State, but might serve to aggravate evils it would be powerless to relieve.

Profoundly impressed with this view of the situation, I deem it my duty at this time to withdraw my credentials from the Senate, and tender through you to the democratic, conservative, and liberal people of Louisiana the trust committed to my hands.

With sentiments of highest respect and esteem, I am, respectfully,

W. L. MCMILLEN.

Mr. WEST. I now ask that the following order be made:

Ordered, That the request of William L. McMillen, heretofore claiming a seat in the Senate from the State of Louisiana, for the return of his credentials be granted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir. I think that had better go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I do not know exactly what bearing it has. There may be no objection to the proposition; but it had better be looked into, it seems to me.

Mr. THURMAN. Let the resolution lie ever until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made to its present consideration, the resolution of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. WEST] will lie over until to-morrow.

EXECUTIVE BUSINESS.

Several messages of an executive nature were received from the President of the United States by Mr. LUCKEY, his Secretary.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, as there seems to be no further legislative business, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After forty-one minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at one o'clock and fifty-three minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, December 10, 1875.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of Tuesday was read and approved.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain the gentleman's motion in a few moments. The Chaplain will please present himself at the bar of the House and take the oath of office.

SWORN INTO OFFICE.

Rev. I. L. Townsend, Chaplain of the House of Representatives, appeared at the bar and qualified by taking the oath of office prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862.

MEMBER SWORN IN.

Mr. SHEAKLEY. My colleague, Mr. Egbert, Representative from the twenty-seventh district of Pennsylvania, is present, and desires to be sworn in.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will present himself at the bar.

Mr. EGBERT appeared at the bar and duly qualified by taking the oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next.

Mr. RANDALL. Pending that, I desire to yield to the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. GIBSON.]

The SPEAKER. The resolution of the gentleman from Louisiana can be entertained after the resolution to adjourn over is disposed of.

The question being taken on agreeing to Mr. RANDALL'S resolution,

The SPEAKER stated that in the judgment of the Chair the "ayes" had it.

Several MEMBERS. Divide.

The "ayes" having risen,

The SPEAKER stated that a manifest majority was in favor of the resolution.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House do now adjourn; but pending that motion I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. GIBSON.]

MISSISSIPPI LEVEES.

Mr. GIBSON. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of eleven, to be known as the Committee on the Mississippi Levees, be added to the committees of the House.

Mr. GIBSON. On that resolution I move the previous question.

Mr. HOAR. That resolution should go to the Committee on the Rules. I make the point of order that it requires unanimous consent.

Mr. GIBSON. I do not yield for any motions, but call the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order of the gentleman from Massachusetts. The resolution has already been received as by unanimous consent, and is before the House.

Mr. GIBSON. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. GIBSON moved to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

Mr. HOPKINS. I offer (at the request of the Pennsylvania delegation) the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That so much of the message of the President as relates to the proposed centennial celebration be referred to a select committee of thirteen members to be appointed by the Speaker.

Mr. HOAR. I make the point of order that the President's message has already been referred to the Committee of the Whole, and is not before the House.

Mr. RANDALL. This is one part of the President's message, and has the same rights that would pertain to it under the general resolution distributing the subjects treated of in the message.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. The practice is to go into Committee of the Whole, and to refer the message by subdivisions. It is not usual to do it in the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suspend a moment, in order to refer to the order of the House in regard to the President's message.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the Chair will allow me, I would suggest that the matter can be reached by going into Committee of the Whole, when the action proposed would be in order.

The SPEAKER. The Journal shows that the entire message has already been referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOAR. I make no objection to the House going into Committee of the Whole for this sole purpose.

Mr. RANDALL. We have already referred the entire message to the Committee of the Whole, but it appertains to the House to make such disposition of parts of it as they may see fit.

Mr. KASSON. I think there would be unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the consideration of that part of the message for the purpose of taking early action on this resolution. I think we all understand that the object of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is to get the committee to consider this as early as possible.

Mr. HOAR. I make no objection to that, but I think we are entitled to have the rules of the House observed.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. The resolution may be adopted by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOAR. I have no objection to discharging the Committee of the Whole from the consideration of so much of the message as relates to the centennial celebration, and referring that to a select committee to be appointed at once.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania being entertained?

There was no objection.

The question being taken on Mr. HOPKINS'S resolution, it was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now move that the House adjourn.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Will the gentleman yield to me to offer a joint resolution?

Mr. HOLMAN. I will yield to have the resolution read.

POSTAGE ON THIRD CLASS MAIL-MATTER.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I ask unanimous consent to submit for action at this time the following joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That so much of the act of March 3, 1875, as has been construed to cover postage on printed matter of the third class be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield for that, but it seems to me that it should be in the form of a bill rather than a joint resolution, and I suggest to the gentleman that he make that change.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Very good; I will make it a bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill, that it may be printed with it.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I have here a bill received from the Post-Office Department, which I desire to have read.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] yield for the resolution of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MACDOUGALL?]

Mr. HOLMAN. I do.

The SPEAKER. Does he yield to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. STARKWEATHER] to offer the bill he has indicated?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the only proposition before the House is the proposition of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. This is a bill which comes from the Post-Office Department, and I should like to have it read.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to have it read?

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield to have it read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to amend the law relating to postage on articles of mailable matter of the third class.

Be it enacted, &c., That on and after the 1st day of January, 1876, postage shall be charged on pamphlets, transient newspapers, periodicals, magazines, handbills, posters, unsealed circulars and prospectuses, proof-sheets and corrected proof-sheets, at the rate of one cent for each two ounces or fraction thereof; and the postage on all other mailable matter of the third class shall be and remain as now provided by law.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I cannot withdraw my objection to this bill. I have no doubt the measure is exactly right, but I wish to say to my friend from Connecticut that it is an important measure, and ought to have the fullest consideration. I have no doubt the bill is right.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. It comes from the Post-Office Department. I was requested to have it offered, and moved it as a substitute to the proposition of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HOLMAN. I cannot yield for that purpose. As I have said, I have no doubt it is all right.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. The gentleman has already yielded, and I have the right to offer it as a substitute.

Mr. HOLMAN. I only yielded to have it read for information.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I believe I have the floor to offer it as a substitute.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman ought to observe that I merely yielded to have the bill read for information. I think, perhaps, the bill should pass, but my friend's bill as originally offered is certainly a little too broad in its provisions. I suggest we take a moment's time for reflection on the subject, and accordingly press my motion for an adjournment of the House.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. The gentleman from Indiana yielded to the gentleman from New York to present his bill. He presented it, and I have now moved mine as a substitute, which I have the right to do. I claim the floor

Mr. HOLMAN. I renew my motion to adjourn.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I hope the gentleman will not object. It is important this bill should pass.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no doubt it is an important bill. I think, perhaps, it is exactly right; but we do not wish to act on it without a moment's time for examination and reflection.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. If the gentleman does not object, let it go over.

Mr. HOLMAN. They will be printed in the RECORD—the proposition of the gentleman from New York and the proposition of the gentleman from Connecticut—and we can see and understand them. I move the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman consent to let it go over as unfinished business?

Mr. STARKWEATHER. He can do that, and save the bill before the House.

Mr. COX. The gentleman blundered last session about that, and I hope he will not insist on doing the same again.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I did not blunder.

Mr. HOLMAN. That side of the House blundered.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. The gentleman blundered as much as anybody about it.

Mr. HOLMAN. We will correct your blunder if you will only give us time.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. This is the proper time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to examine the bills. Both will be printed in the RECORD to-morrow. I move the House adjourn.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Does the gentleman object to reduction of this postage?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not. I have already said it as many times as I could that I think the measure is right; but we wish to examine it.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Let it go over as unfinished business.

Mr. HOLMAN. You passed the measure, and we are anxious to correct your mistake.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. You voted for it, and made the mistake as much as anybody.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman can at least afford to be gracious. We ought to have time to examine the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. This is not the only mistake in the law, and the whole subject should be carefully examined by the proper committee, and whatever shall be done should be rightly done.

Mr. BRIGHT. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I wish to know whether the proposition of the gentleman from New York is pending?

The SPEAKER. It is not. Neither proposition is pending. They were both read to the House for information by consent of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I understood the gentleman from Indiana to admit the bill of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I offered mine as a substitute.

Mr. HOLMAN. I allowed it to be read for information of the House. They will both go into the RECORD, and in the morning we can see what the propositions exactly are.

DEAF AND DUMB INSTITUTE.

The SPEAKER. Under the law reorganizing the Institute for the Deaf and Dumb in this District it is made the duty of the Chair to appoint two trustees for that institution. The Chair now announces the appointment of the following gentlemen: Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, and Mr. WHEELER, of New York.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented the petition of Bayse N. Wescott, praying to be restored to the active list of the Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I present the memorial of Perez Peck and 2,325 others, members of the yearly meeting of the Society of Friends for New England, who state that they are solemnly impressed with a sense of the cruel and unchristian character of all wars, and respectfully and earnestly petition the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled to enact such a law as shall make it the duty of the Government of the United States to negotiate with the governments of other nations for the establishment of an international court of arbitration, whereby all claims, differences, and grievances arising between nations entering into the compact shall be adjusted without appeal to the sword.

Mr. President, in presenting this petition, so very numerously signed by members of that religious society which by their peaceful and orderly bearing, by their obedience to law, by their temperance and frugality, and by their conscientious devotion to the truth, as it has been, from time to time, made known to them, have produced so deep an impression outside of their own organization, I should be false to the peaceful doctrines in which I was educated, if I did not bear my testimony to the truth of the statements of this memorial. It is, indeed, too much to hope that mankind will be prevented, entirely or mainly, from settling national disputes by the arbitration of the sword, but whatever goes in that direction is in the direction of humanity and civilization and of public and private virtue. A conspicuous and encouraging example of this was afforded by our own Government and England lately, very much to the advantage of both countries; and whatever nation attempts to walk in the ways of peace will promote its own prosperity and the civilization of the world, and we have divine authority that it will commend itself to the gracious favor of Almighty God. I move that this memorial be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WEST. I ask leave to present the memorial of quite a number of citizens of Louisiana, a thousand and odd, against the operations of what is known as "the little tariff bill," with respect to the duties upon wines, the memorialists claiming that they have been subjected to an onerous exaction under the provisions of that bill, and asking relief. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. INGALLS. I present also the memorial of sundry Pottawatomie Indians, praying payment, as provided by the tenth section of the treaty of 1867, for depredations committed upon their reservation in Kansas. Appended to this memorial are a large number of executive documents and communications from the heads of Departments, relating to the proof that has been taken in support of these claims. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and printed.

Mr. KELLY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 65) conforming the boundaries of the State of Oregon to those fixed and defined in the constitution of that State as presented to Congress when applying for admission into the Union; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 66) for the relief of the legal representatives of Chauncy M. Lockwood; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 67) attaching the Territory of Alaska to and making it a part of the Territory of Washington, and providing for a civil government therein; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 68) for the improvement of the military wagon-road from Scottsburgh, Oregon, to Camp Stewart, Oregon; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, very considerable sums of money are due persons in the Southern States and elsewhere in the Union for mail services rendered anterior to the late war, and for other services. The payment of such claims is prohibited by an act passed after the close of the war, and I ask leave to introduce a bill to provide for their payment.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 69) to repeal so much of section 3480 of the Revised Statutes as forbids the payment of the accounts, claims, and demands therein named, and all laws and clauses of laws forbidding the payment thereof, and appropriating money to pay the same when duly established; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SPENCER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 70) for the relief of Ana M. Rolas y Robaldo, widow of Francisco Robaldo, deceased; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SARGENT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 71) to protect persons of foreign birth against forcible constraint or involuntary servitude; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 72) to forfeit certain public lands granted to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 73) to extend the time for filing claims for additional bounty under the act of July 28, 1866; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 74) for the relief of Mark W. Delahay; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 75) to amend section 5138 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, permitting national banks to organize with a capital of $50,000 in towns irrespective of population; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONKLING (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 76) for the relief of David Ogden, Andrew Foster, and other ship-owners; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MERRIMON. Section 4716 of the Revised Statutes prevents the payment of a class of pensioners who are rapidly passing away from the world. If the Government is going to do them any benefit, it ought to be done promptly and without any further delay. I ask leave, without previous notice, to introduce a bill repealing this clause.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 77) to repeal section 4716 of the Revised Statutes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 78) to extend the duration of the court of commissioners of Alabama claims; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

EXTRADITION OF FUGITIVES FROM JUSTICE.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by general law, for the extradition of fugitives from justice upon the proper application and proof by the governments from whence they may have escaped, and also as to the propriety of refusing asylum to fugitive criminals, and removing them from the country.

Mr. President, a few words only. I do not desire, of course, to have any law that will trench upon the general privilege of giving an asylum to foreigners in this country; but it seems to me that this is a matter of sufficient importance to be legislated upon generally by all nations of the world. Certainly I can conceive of no reason why we should desire to furnish an asylum for fugitives from justice from any quarter of the world. It seems to me that we ought to be willing to get rid of all the rascals that come to this country in the speediest manner possible.

Mr. President, there is another branch of the resolution. It is well known that we have a large number of criminals coming to our shores almost weekly, and it does appear to me that we ought to have some means by which we can prevent this country from becoming the general asylum for fugitive criminals. It seems to me that we can raise up enough of our own, without increasing the number by those coming from abroad.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

CHANNEL OF CUMBERLAND SOUND.

Mr. CONOVER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to the Senate his views as to the importance and practicability of improving the channel of the entrance to Cumberland Sound, with estimates of the probable cost of the construction.

REPORTS OF PUBLIC ACCOUNTS.

Mr. DAVIS. I offer a resolution, which I send to the desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas by the second section of the act of Congress entitled "An act further to amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments," approved March 3, 1809, (2 Statutes at Large, page 536,) it was enacted that "the said Comptroller of the Treasury should also lay an annual statement before Congress, during the first week of their session, of the accounts in the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments which may have remained more than three years unsettled, or on which balances appear to have been due more than three years prior to the 30th of September then last past, together with a statement of the causes which have prevented the settlement of the accounts or the recovery of the balances due to the United States;" and whereas by section 13 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the prompt settlement of the public accounts," approved March 2, 1817, (3 Statutes at Large, page 368,) it was enacted "that it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause all accounts of the expenditure of public money to be settled within the year, except where the distance of the places where such expenditures occur may be such as to make further time necessary; and in respect to expenditures at such places, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the assent of the President, shall establish fixed periods at which a settlement shall be required; and it shall be the duty of the First Comptroller to lay before Congress annually, during the first week of their session, a list of such officers as shall have failed in that year to make the settlement required by law;" and whereas it is asserted that no report to Congress pursuant to said statutes has been made since March 2, 1865: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby requested to inform the Senate whether such reports have been made since March 2, 1865; and, if not, why not.

And whereas by section 272 of the Revised Statutes, approved June 22, 1874, page 44, it is enacted "that the First Comptroller shall make an annual report to Congress of such officers as shall have failed to make settlement of their accounts for the preceding fiscal year within the year, or within such further time as may have been prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury for such settlement;" and whereas it is asserted that no report has been made pursuant to said last-named section and statute: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby requested to inform the Senate whether any such reports have been made; and, if not, why not.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, in offering the resolution which has just been read it is not my intention to reflect in any way or manner on the present able and efficient head of the Treasury Department; but, as I view it, the requirement of the law of 1809, and also of the Revised Statutes, has not been complied with, and, in my judgment, it is proper and right that it should be, so that the people of the country, as well as those who are to frame legislation, may know who are the defaulters to the Government. It is known that partial statements, called for by resolution of Congress, have been made from time to time, and I have before me one made in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives in February, 1871, by which, in the Internal Revenue Department alone, over twenty million dollars appear to have been in default to the Government.

It was my intention to ask that this resolution lie on the table and be printed, so that every one can see just exactly what it is, and at an early day I will call it up for the action of the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the resolution had better be referred. As a matter of course, if the law requires these reports to be made, they ought to be made; but this resolution is confessedly based upon assertions the authority for which has not been given to the Senate, and we ought not to pass a resolution of this kind until, by its committee, the Senate has some foundation for action. It ought to be informed of the nature of these assertions and the basis of them. I think the better way would be to refer the resolution to the Committee on Finance. If reports have not been made as required by law, I, for one, can assure the Senator there is no doubt about the disposition of the Senate to call for them; but I object to the passage of a resolution of this kind, or the consideration of it, based on assertions the authority or foundation for which is not given, without a reference to a committee. I suggest to the Senator from West Virginia that the better course would be to refer the resolution to the Committee on Finance, and if it shall appear that these reports have not been made according to law, as a matter of course there can be no objection to the passage of a resolution calling for them and inquiring the reason why they have not been made.

Mr. DAVIS. I did not ask for the present consideration of the resolution; I desired it to be printed so that the members of the Finance Committee and all others might see precisely what it called for. I shall have no special objection to its going to the Finance Committee, with the understanding that at an early day it shall be reported back. The chairman of the Finance Committee and the Senate will recollect that probably at two previous sessions I offered resolutions calling for a list of defaulters, and in each case my call was refused by the Senate from some cause; it was once reported against by the committee, and at another time the Senate laid the resolution on the table, not desiring to act upon it. Now I wish the law to be complied with and the country to have this information. I believe there are immense sums due the Government by defaulters which can and ought to be collected.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator is mistaken as regards the action of the Senate and of the committee in relation to the former resolutions. The Committee on Finance did promptly report back one resolution of his with a statement that all the information called for by it which was material had already been printed, and, if I remember correctly, I produced the documents and referred the Senator to them, in which in printed reports already sent from the Executive Departments to Congress we found all the information that he called for except matters of detail which, if given, would overload our tables and occupy the Public Printer for days. If this is the same resolution that was offered at the last session, I am prepared at once to vote against it.

Mr. DAVIS. It is not the same.

Mr. SHERMAN. But if it is different, as I inferred it to be from the reading of the resolution, as a matter of course it ought to be examined, and if the assertions contained in the paper are true these reports should be required to be made. But as the Senator himself does not make the assertion, and only says it is asserted so and so without giving the authority, as a matter of course the Committee on Finance ought to inquire into the truth of the assertions, and if they are true there will be no disposition to prevent the making of these reports.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the Senator from West Virginia allow the resolution to be again reported from the Clerk's desk?

Mr. DAVIS. I have no objection at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the reports called for by the resolution were made from 1809 annually until 1865. Since that time I have been unable to find any such report whatever. I hold in my hand one made in 1847, one made in 1856, one made in 1860, and one in 1865. Since 1865 I have been unable, from any source, to find a report made in pursuance of the laws quoted in the resolution. I inquired at the Treasury Department of the First Comptroller, whose duty it appears to be by the law to make them, and the answer was that he believed none had been made since. It is my belief, from a careful examination, that the reports have not been submitted.

Now, a word as to what the Senator from Ohio says in regard to the resolution of last year. I hold in my hand the report made by the Committee on Finance upon it. In that report the then Secretary of the Treasury is quoted as saying that he knew of no public necessity for such information. He further said that it would take from three to six months and cost $75,000 to give the information of who was indebted to the Government. If that be so, the greater the necessity at once for it. What would be thought of a business house, or of a corporation, or of any one who was doing any business whatever, who could not turn to his ledger as fast as he could call out the names and tell who was indebted to him? It would at once be said that there was a great necessity for examining into such a condition of affairs.

I have no disposition to call for any information that has been already furnished, and I think if the Senator from Ohio will examine the resolution and then see what it bears upon, he himself will agree that the information for which it calls has not been furnished. So far as I have been able to find, neither the Department of Justice nor the Freedmen's Bureau has made any report whatever of the defaulters in either since 1865, and there have been only partial reports from some of the other Departments as called for by a resolution of the House. The Senate, I believe, has not passed many resolutions of inquiry of this nature, but has always in some form or other voted them down or got rid of them.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, this, as I understand from the reading of the resolution, is simply an inquiry. It is not an inquiry for the names of defaulters, to which objection was made before that it would take, I believe, six months or three months and a large expenditure of money to furnish that list. It is a very extraordinary and deplorable state of affairs if it would take three months and a large expenditure of many thousand dollars to furnish a list of the defaulters to the Government. It would be a very bad showing for the Government if the list of defaulters is so numerous that it would take three months and a large expenditure of money to furnish that list to Congress. But this resolution does not call for any list of defaulters. It presents, as I understand it, a specific inquiry, why certain reports required by law have not been made; an inquiry that can be answered in half an hour; an inquiry that it requires no time or no very considerable time to answer—that requires no expense to enable the Secretary to answer it. Why should this inquiry, then, be referred to the Committee on Finance? The only reason given by my colleague, who suggests its reference to that committee, is that the resolution says it is asserted that no such reports have been made since March 2, 1865. There is no doubt about the law. The laws are upon our statute-books. There is no question then as to what is or what has been the law; but the simple question is, have these reports been made? Now, why shall we not inquire of the Secretary of the Treasury? I take it that if the resolution were to go to the Finance Committee, the very first thing that committee would do would be to send a copy of it to the Secretary of the Treasury or the First Comptroller to know whether those reports had not been made. Why shall we not send it direct?

Surely we know in respect to one of these reports—that required by the Revised Statutes—that we have received no such report at this session, although the law requires it to be made in the first week of the session, but that week has just elapsed, and there may be good reasons why it has not been sent in pursuant to the requirement of the law. But in respect to the other, what is the statement of the Senator from West Virginia? That he has searched and can find no such report since March 2, 1865; and that he has been informed by the First Comptroller, whose duty it is to make this report, that it is his belief that no such report has been made since March 2, 1865. What more do you want on which to found the assertion in the resolution?

It seems to me, sir, that there is no propriety in sending this mere resolution of inquiry to any committee at all. Let it go at once to the Secretary of the Treasury, and if the reports have been made, or if there is sufficient reason why they have not been made, he can answer it, and he can answer it promptly, and without any expense whatsoever to the Government.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I have but a word to say in reply to my colleague, and it is a word that will apply to all resolutions of this kind which are introduced into the Senate of the United States. Here is a resolution that recites several statutes, one as old as 1809, and which does not seem to have been carried into the Revised Statutes of the United States. It recites a number of other statutes, to which we have had no opportunity to refer. It also asserts three or four different propositions of fact, the truth of which is not vouched for even by the Senator from West Virginia, because he simply says that he asked a certain officer, the Comptroller, whether or not these reports had been sent in, and he was informed that he thought not. He therefore did not go to the proper source of information. It seems to me, under these circumstances, all such resolutions of inquiry involving expense, involving the examination of laws, ought to be sent in the first place to the appropriate committees; and my colleague would in a similar case, on behalf of a committee in which he was concerned, insist upon it that his committee charged with the particular matters should examine the allegations contained in the resolution before the action of the Senate should be had upon it. All I desire is to see whether or not the allegations contained in this resolution are true. If so, as a matter of course the reports ought to be made and the information furnished, unless some satisfactory reason be given to the contrary. It may be, and I think it is probably true, that the very first thing the Committee on Finances would do would be to send to the Treasury Department to ascertain whether these documents have been sent, whether the assertions contained in this resolution are true; and that is the proper course to be pursued. The Senate ought not to resolve upon an assertion until it has by its proper committee examined to see at least whether there is ground for that assertion. Therefore, in this as well as in all other cases of like kind where information is called for, wherever there is a doubt about any fact or statement in a resolution, that fact ought to be ascertained before the Senate passes the resolution and thus precludes to that extent the examination of the fact. I have no objection to the printing of the resolution as a matter of course; but I move that it be referred to the Committee on Finance in the ordinary way.

Mr. THURMAN. One word. I must dissent from the statement of my colleague, that wherever a question of fact arises the Senate is first to ascertain what the fact is. Why, sir, the very object of the resolution is to ascertain the fact by inquiring at the proper Department. If we knew the fact, there would be no necessity for inquiry. It is because there may be a question whether or not such is the fact that we respectfully inquire of the proper officer to state whether or not the reports have been made; and, if they have not been made, then the resolution gives him an opportunity to explain why they have not been made. I can see no earthly reason for a reference of this resolution.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I think it has been the general sentiment heretofore on all sides of the Chamber that resolutions of this kind, involving a large expenditure in the preparation of the information to be received——

Mr. DAVIS. Allow me to correct my friend. The resolution only asks the Secretary of the Treasury whether or not these reports have been made. It makes no inquiry as to whether they are proper or not. The simple question it presents is whether the reports have been made. It involves no expense whatever.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It seems to me that that does not change the aspect of the question very much. If they have not been made, of course that involves the second question, that they will be called for, and, therefore, will involve a large amount of expense. All of these resolutions asking for information ought to be based upon something more than the lack of information of a single member of the Senate. Such a proposition should go to a committee and be reported upon.

And now, in relation to this very matter, last year we had a statement of the accounts of the Treasury containing all these items; it was reported by the chairman of the Committee on Printing; a very bulky document, probably involving a larger amount of expense to print it than any other document that was presented. After lying here on the table several days, I think it was almost the unanimous consent of the Senate that the printing of that bulky document should not be asked for.

Mr. DAVIS. What report was that?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I do not know that the Senator from West Virginia saw it, but I certainly saw the document here and looked it over at my leisure, and it was of immense bulk. I have no objection to having the information that the Senator from West Virginia seeks, but I am not certain that it has not been already furnished in reports heretofore made. I think the Senate will be in an awkward position when it asks for this information if it has already been communicated to the Senate; and therefore I am in favor of referring the resolution to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DAVIS. I could not catch what report it was that the Senator from Vermont referred to which was on the table.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. A statement of the accounts of the Treasury Department.

Mr. DAVIS. Did that contain the defaulters? "No," some Senator says; and I say "no" too.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It did.

Mr. DAVIS. No; it was different information in toto. I was careful in drawing this resolution to avoid stating any fact; I merely said it was asserted to be so. I am confident, though, that no report of the defaulters has been made since 1865; I am confident that the law has been disregarded since that time, and this resolution is simply to ask the Secretary of the Treasury whether or not the reports have been made. He can answer yes or no; and that is the whole of the resolution—all it seeks for and all it asks for. I see no use whatever in referring it to any committee, unless you want it to die as others have done—unless the purpose is to strangle it.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, my recollection is that a very bulky volume, or several volumes—I think there were four or five—of the disbursements of the Treasury, and a statement of the accounts of the debtors of the Government, were presented here, and it was the opinion of some gentlemen on the other side that they ought to be printed. But, after examining the volumes, the Committee on Printing, I think, unanimously—my friend from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] will correct me if I am mistaken—thought they had better not be printed. I brought them here and laid them on this desk, called the attention of the Senate to the fact that we thought they were not worth the cost of printing; that really they afforded no information; they gave no information except that which was merely technical; and as to figures——

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator from Rhode Island will allow me to say that my recollection is that that was a statement of the expenditures, not of defaulters; it did not touch them at all.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think there was a list of the defaulters, but I may be mistaken; it was some time ago.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me to correct him? I think I can bring the case to his recollection. There is a different statute from either of those recited in this resolution which requires a report to be made every year of the expenditures of the public money, giving the name of every individual to whom even a dime has been paid, with a reference to the act under which the money was appropriated for that payment. That is a very old statute, and it was complied with, I think, every year before the war; and you find each year a book called "Public Accounts"—that is the label on the back of the book which contains that itemized statement of the expenditures of the Government. For some reason or other, perhaps owing to the multitude of payments during the war, and the Department being occupied with such matters, that report was not made. Some years ago, perhaps as many as four, I introduced a resolution asking why that report had not been made. Some one requested, I think, that it might lie on the table—I am speaking from recollection alone—until some inquiry could be made at the Department. It was looked at, and the report was then made. It was a most voluminous affair. It was referred to the Committee on Printing of the Senate to know whether it should be printed. The chairman of the Committee on Printing, as I had moved in the matter, invited my attention to the subject. We examined it. I must say that the law had not been complied with strictly, and the fact was that the report, which would have made a volume nearly as large as the Revised Statutes, contained nothing in the world but the names of persons who had received money and the amount paid to them. It was really of no use whatever to print it. That had no reference whatever to defaulters; it was simply a report of the expenditures of the Government, itemized so as to give the name of each individual who had received any public money and the amount that he had received. It was on a wholly different subject, and was made under a wholly different statute from that which is now before the Senate.

Mr. ANTHONY. I may be mistaken, but my impression is very distinct that there was a list of the debtors of the Government there.

Mr. THURMAN. No.

Mr. SHERMAN. The very dispute here between Senators as to what are the contents of a report which was laid on our tables shows that this resolution, asserting a certain state of facts, ought to be referred before the Senate acts upon it. I am rather inclined to think that the law of 1809 has been repealed. It does not seem to be in the Revised Statutes.

Mr. THURMAN. I will say to my colleague that whenever he comes to investigate that subject, I think he will find a very curious state of affairs; that the most material provisions of the laws of 1809 and 1817 were left out of the Revised Statutes without ever having been repealed, although the Revised Statutes profess to be the laws in force on the 1st of December, 1873.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then, according to my colleague, the basis of this inquiry is a law of 1809, which, by the judgment of Congress in acting upon the Revised Statutes and by the judgment of the commissioners, has been repealed.

Mr. THURMAN. That did not obviate the necessity of making the reports while the law was in force.

Mr. SHERMAN. That may be so; but this resolution calls for a reason why the report has not been made at this session. The time for it has not yet come, nor will it until to-day or to-morrow; but, at all events, the allegation lying at the basis of this resolution is that the law which requires these reports is still in force, although, by the judgment of Congress and by the opinion of the various boards who prepared the volume of Revised Statutes, the law has been repealed. It seems to me that that is the best commentary on this class of resolutions. It seems to me that the Senate ought, in every case where a resolution is presented that involves a single matter of doubt, whether of fact or of law, to send it to a committee in order to ascertain whether the resolution itself, before it receives the sanction of the Senate, contains the true fact and the true law; and in this case as well as in all other cases committees are made to see that the Senate does not commit any mistake of that kind. Now, sir, it would be a very singular thing if the Secretary of the Treasury, or whoever may be the proper officer, in answering this resolution, should say to us that the law of 1809, on which the resolution is based, has been itself repealed, and then we should be put in the position of calling for information why a certain law has not been complied with that has been repealed.

But, Mr. President, I simply move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DAVIS. I understood the Senator from Ohio as saying that the law of 1809 had been repealed. While we might differ in that particular, he did not speak of the law of 1817, which specially called for this report, and that, we all know, has not been repealed, because it is copied in part into the Revised Statutes. The Revised Statutes require the report mentioned in the latter clauses of the resolution. The Senator from Ohio speaks of the present session of Congress——

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the Senator from West Virginia refer to the section of the Revised Statutes which calls for a report of the defaulters to the Government?

Mr. DAVIS. The resolution refers to the law, on page 42 of the volume, section 272.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Now, if the Senator from West Virginia will listen, I think he will see that that section does not call for what he supposes it does.

SEC. 272. The First Comptroller shall make an annual report to Congress of such officers as shall have failed to make settlement of their accounts for the preceding fiscal year within the year, or within such further time as may have been prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury for such settlement.

It does not refer to defaulters at all. It does not refer to the subject the Senator from West Virginia seems to have in mind.

Mr. DAVIS. The provision as to further time applies where officers live at a great distance, according to the act of 1817.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I take it for granted that this Senate would not infer that the law of 1817 is operative, or was operative previous to the passage of the Revised Statutes, unless it is found in the Revised Statutes; certainly not on the judgment of any single Senator, however learned in the law he may be.

Mr. DAVIS. When we come to examine this question more fully, we shall find a singular state of things existing, arising from that to which the Senator from Massachusetts has called our attention. But, Mr. President, I hold in my hand the reports made in 1865, in 1860, and in 1847. [Exhibiting documents.] These are the reports that the Senator speaks of as involving such an immense amount of printing and costing so many thousand dollars. They cover only a few pages each. I have taken these three as samples; and it will be seen that they did not involve any great amount of clerical labor. These reports were made regularly, as I understand and believe, up to 1865, but none since then. The Senator from Massachusetts, who has been Secretary of the Treasury, has read the section of the Statutes which speaks of such further time as the Secretary may direct. I will ask that Senator whether, during his period of service there, he directed the allowance of any further time? If not, the law required settlement to be made within the year.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The point I make is, that this provision of the statute does not refer to defaulters at all; but to persons who have not settled their accounts within the year or within such further time as may have been allowed by the Secretary of the Treasury; and we have no information upon it, as the Senator says. Therefore we are bound to infer that there are no such persons. There may be a great many defaulters; but nevertheless the statute does not require the Secretary of the Treasury or the Comptroller of the Treasury to furnish a list of the defaulters. It may be wise for the Senate to have such a list; I am in favor of having it; but what I wish to impress upon the Senator from West Virginia is, that he has misapprehended the provision of the statute, and that if it appears that the Secretary of the Treasury has not furnished a list of the defaulters, it nevertheless does also appear that he has not violated the statute to which the Senator refers.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator from Massachusetts was Secretary of the Treasury at a time when the Revised Statutes were not in force, and when the law of 1817 was in force. Then it was clear, as I understand, by that law that these reports should be made.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The Senator must admit that the Revised Statutes are to be taken, until the contrary is shown, as being the embodiment of the laws which were in force at the time and previous to the time of the enactment of the Revised Statutes; and if we do not find in the Revised Statutes the law of 1817 re-enacted or reproduced, and he does not find a repeal of it within the time when the Senator from Massachusetts occupied the office of Secretary of the Treasury, it follows naturally, logically, and legally that the law of 1817 was not in force when he held the office of Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. DAVIS. Senators may differ very much as to what the present law is as found in the Revised Statutes. I have consulted lawyers—at least one or two of prominence—and they construe the statute very differently from the Senator from Massachusetts. They believe it to be his duty now under that statute, as certainly it was under the law of 1817, to make these reports; but, as I understand, they have not been made for ten years.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator from West Virginia to read to us the act of 1817 upon which he relies?

Mr. DAVIS. It is in the resolutions.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But I have tried to read the resolution, and I should think I had written it myself; it is so bad I cannot read it. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS. The law referred to is sections 13 and 14, page 368, of the third volume of Statutes at Large.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not want to take up further time with this matter, except to say only a word. I do not think we are to get away from the real point in this case by the observation of the Senator from Massachusetts that these acts of Congress do not relate to defaulters. I think they do relate to defaulters. The act required that the accounts of these officers should be settled within the year, unless, owing to the distance of the officer from the seat of Government, the Secretary of the Treasury for that special reason should extend the time within which he might settle his accounts; and if he has not settled his accounts within the year, or within the further time granted by the Secretary of the Treasury, he is a defaulter. But that is not the question really here, whether this is to be a report of the defaulters to the Government or not, or whether it is to be a report of those whose accounts have not been settled. There is no denying the fact that the law requires the report, whatever that report may be, and this resolution inquires whether the report has been made, and, if not made, why it has not been made; and that is all there is of it. It is not necessary at all to go into the character of what the report would be if made. It is sufficient that this Government from 1809 has considered this report to be a thing that ought to be made to Congress for good and sufficient public reasons; and now, if the acts have not been repealed and the reports have not been made for ten years, Congress ought to know why they have not been made. That is the whole of it.

Now, I do not undertake to say with absolute positiveness that there may not have been a repeal of the acts, or of some portion of them, of 1809 and 1817; although I am told by some who have examined the question that they can find no such repeal. But there is no presumption, as the Senator from Massachusetts seems to suppose, that because those acts are not found as a whole re-enacted in the Revised Statutes of 1874, therefore they were repealed as early as 1865——

Mr. BOUTWELL. The Senator from Ohio unintentionally leaves out one element of my statement. If it was not found that they were repealed after the Senator from Massachusetts took the office of Secretary of the Treasury, it is then to be presumed that they were previously repealed or not operative while he was in the office.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not know any presumption at all that arises from their not being found in the Revised Statutes of 1874, except that the commissioners did not consider them in force on the 1st day of December, 1873. That is all. There is no presumption that they were not in force in 1865, and 1866, and 1867, and 1868, and so on, unless a presumption should arise from the fact that the reports were not made; that could be the only thing. But when we come to look at the other fact which has been mentioned here this morning, that the law which was plainly in force, requiring a detailed statement of the expenditures of the Government, was not complied with for many years——

Mr. BOUTWELL. I think the Senator is in error about that. I have before me here a printed statement of the receipts and expenditures of the Government for the year ending the 30th June, 1872.

Mr. THURMAN. O, yes; but the Senator will find that some time elapsed, more than the law required, before there was any other report after 1872.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I cannot say about that; but I will say, however, that such reports have been made to Congress since 1872, but they may not have been printed.

Mr. THURMAN. One was made after I introduced a resolution calling for it.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If they were not printed, it was the fault of Congress.

Mr. THURMAN. One of them was made after a resolution was introduced calling for it. But I do not wish to prolong this discussion. The whole simple question is this: we ask the Secretary of the Treasury, who is most familiar with the laws governing his Department, two simple interrogatories: first, have these reports been made; secondly, if not, why not? If the laws have been repealed, his answer will be "They have not been made because the law requiring them was repealed." If the law is in force and the reports have not been made, then, I suppose, he will give the best reason he can; but what it will be I cannot foresee.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. Does he think it would be a becoming, I will not say a grave proceeding, for the Senate deliberately to pass a resolution asking the Secretary of the Treasury why he had not done such a thing, and receive answer from him that he had not done it because the law requiring it had been repealed? The Senator has heard sometimes in court of making vain or blank motions. Would it not be very odd for this body to pass a resolution asking the Secretary why he had not complied with a certain law without ever taking the trouble to find out whether there was such a law or not? I apprehend the honorable Senator would hardly advise us to do that: send to the Secretary to find out whether a law exists or not, by putting to him a question why he does not execute that law, and receive as an answer that there is not any such law!

Mr. THURMAN. I do not think myself there would be anything very strange in it. Here is a law on the statute-book. Those who have looked into the statute-book find no repeal. It may possibly be that, owing to imperfect indexing or the like, a repealing act has been overlooked. If the law has been repealed, the Secretary of the Treasury surely knows it; and, just as the Executive Department may ask the Attorney-General for a legal opinion, we may ask the Secretary of the Treasury whether these reports have been made, and if not, why not. I confess that, although I claim to know a little bit of law, I should not be very much ashamed to ask the Secretary of the Treasury that very question; and if this resolution goes to the Committee on Finance, the first thing that committee will do will be to ask that very question.

Mr. CONKLING. Would not the Senator accept, although he is not the mover of the resolution, an amendment inquiring first of the Secretary whether there is any such statute or not; and then, second, if there is, whether he has executed it; and, third, if he has not, why he has not? That I think would cover the whole ground in the view that the Senator suggests now.

Mr. THURMAN. I think the resolution is in very good form. I would not amend it at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DAVIS. It appears to me that, when the resolution simply asks the Secretary of the Treasury whether or not these reports have been made, it is unnecessary to send it to the Finance Committee or any other committee. When I introduced the resolution my intention was to let it be printed and lie on the table until to-morrow, and then call it up; but the Senator from Ohio has moved its reference to the Committee on Finance. I hope he will withdraw his motion or not insist upon it. The resolution asks for no printing, and would cause no delay. It will certainly cause some delay to send it to the Finance Committee. It is, I think, a fact—I believe it after examination—that no reports of this kind have been made since 1865. I said in my opening remarks that it was not my intention in any way or manner to reflect upon the present incumbent of the Treasury Department, for I believe he is doing his duty; and I had no thought about the present session. The present session has been named, and I referred to this practice that far only; but my thought was, why for the last ten years these reports have not been made; and whenever such resolutions have been offered here—I believe I have offered two or three myself in some way or other—they have been disposed of by the Senate so as not to get the information. Now, I hope that the chairman of the Finance Committee will withdraw his motion for reference. If not, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator desires to have this matter go over until to-morrow, I have no objection; but I will not withdraw my motion to refer. I give notice, on the contrary, that I will offer this motion to refer all resolutions of inquiry where disputed questions of fact or law are involved.

Mr. CONKLING. Let it go over now.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am perfectly willing to let it go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. STEVENSON. I hope the resolution will be printed, and let us look at it and see whether there has been a repeal of the law of 1809. If the resolution is printed every Senator will have an opportunity for himself to look at the Revised Statutes, and we can certainly then vote more advisedly upon the resolution itself or upon the motion to refer I hope it will be printed and laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio insist on his motion to refer?

Several SENATORS. Let it go over.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do insist upon the motion, but I have no objection to letting it go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution will lie over under the rule, and be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Objection was not made to the resolution being received and considered. It was received and considered, and a motion is pending to refer it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator who made the motion has withdrawn it. The Chair asked the chairman of the Committee on Finance if he insisted on his motion, and he said he did not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understood him to say he did.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the Chair is misinformed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I said this: that I certainly would insist on the motion to refer, but whether the vote was taken to-day or to-morrow I was perfectly indifferent. The Senator from Kentucky desires to have the resolution printed, and I think there can be no objection to that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The matter may be postponed until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By common consent. Is there objection to postponing it until to-morrow? The Chair hears none. The resolution will be ordered to be printed, if there be no objection.

DUTIES OF INDIAN AGENTS.

Mr. STEVENSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior inform the Senate, if not deemed incompatible with the public interest, whether the duty imposed upon each Indian agent by the tenth section of the act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department for the year ending 30th of June, 1876, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1875, requiring each Indian agent to keep a book of itemized expenditures of every kind, with a record of all contracts, together with the receipts of money from all sources, has been complied with by the said agents.

EXECUTIVE BUSINESS.

Several executive messages were received from the President of the United States, by Mr. LUCKEY, his Secretary.

Mr. MORTON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at one o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 62) to authorize George P. Marsh to accept a certain present from the government of Switzerland and a certain present from the government of Italy, reported it without amendment.

EXTENSION OF COURT OF ALABAMA CLAIMS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 78) to extend the duration of the court of commissioners of Alabama claims, to report the same favorably, with some slight verbal amendments; and as it is very desirable that this bill should pass both Houses before the holidays, in order to keep the court in existence, I ask for its present consideration. I will state that the bill merely provides for continuing the court, with its present powers and organization, for six months, in order that it may complete the business it has before it. The bill does not open any of the disputed questions which surround other parts of the subject, and all the committee thought that it was better not to attempt to open those questions at this time, inasmuch as the chief object of the bill would be very likely to fail in that case. Therefore we report this bill without prejudice to any of these other questions surrounding the matter.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 78) to extend the duration of the court of commissioners of Alabama claims was considered as in Committee of the Whole. By its terms the court of commissioners of Alabama claims, created by the act of June 23, 1874, is to be extended to the 22d day of July next, and all the provisions of that act are to continue in full force during the extended period. The powers of the clerk of the court are extended for an additional period, not to exceed two months from and after the termination of the existence of the court, for the purpose of closing his accounts, depositing the records, documents, and all other papers in the possession of the court or its officers, in the office of the Secretary of State.

The bill was reported by the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments. The first amendment was in line 3, before the words "court of commissioners," to insert "existence of the;" so as to read:

That the existence of the court of commissioners of Alabama claims, created by the act entitled, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 11, before the word "extended," to insert "continued and;" so as to read, "and the same is hereby continued and extended to the 22d day of July next."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 12 and 13, in the following words:

And all the provisions of said act shall continue in full force during said period.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

With the same effect, and no other, as if said last-named day had been named in said act for the termination of the powers of said court; and said act is hereby continued in force during said period.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. ALLISON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 79) to amend section 10 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1875; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. ALLISON. This bill is accompanied by a letter from the Secretary of the Interior; and as it relates to a subject about which a resolution was submitted by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STEVENSON] yesterday, I should be glad to have the letter read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, December 11, 1875.

SIR: I have the honor to invite your attention to section 10 of the act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department for the year ending June 30, 1876, which is as follows:

"That hereafter the security or securities upon the bond required by the act of February 27, 1851, to be given by each Indian agent before entering upon the duties of his office, shall file a sworn statement with the Secretary of the Interior, setting forth the nature and kind of property owned by such security or securities, the value of the same, and where situated; and that no money appropriated by this act shall be paid to any Indian agent hereafter appointed until the security or securities shall have filed such statement. Each Indian agent shall keep a book of itemized expenditures of every kind, with a record of all contracts, together with the receipts of money from all sources; and the books thus kept shall always be open to inspection; and the said books shall remain in the office at the respective reservations, not to be removed from said reservations by said agent, but shall be safely kept and handed over to his successor; and true transcripts of all entries of every character in said books shall be forwarded quarterly by each agent to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs: Provided, That should any agent knowingly make any false entry in said books, or in the transcripts directed to be forwarded to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, or shall knowingly fail to keep a perfect entry in said books as herein prescribed, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction before any United States court having jurisdiction of such offense, shall be fined in a sum not less than five hundred nor more than one thousand dollars, at the discretion of the court, and shall be rendered incompetent to hold said office of Indian agent after conviction under this act."

The reference in the above-quoted section to the act of February 27, 1851, limits the application of the provision of the above section to a portion only of the Indian agents in the employ of the Government. I have required the Indian Office to extend the provisions of said section to all Indian agents, sub-agents, and special agents, so far as the preparation of their bonds and the keeping of the books of itemized expenses are concerned, but am without power to extend the penalties provided by said section to any other agents than those referred to therein. I therefore have the honor to request that the section may be so amended as to extend the provisions and penalties of said section to all agents in the Indian service; and an amendment is herewith submitted which it is believed will accomplish the object desired, if the same shall be enacted into a law.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Z. CHANDLER,
Secretary.

REPORTS OF PUBLIC ACCOUNTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further resolutions, the Chair will call the attention of the Senate, under the rules, to a resolution which lies on the table, and which will be stated by the Secretary.

The CHIEF CLERK. The resolution submitted by Mr. DAVIS, calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for the reasons why certain reports required by law to be made to Congress have not been made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution was read yesterday; and the pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to refer it to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DAVIS. I did not understand that the motion to refer to the Committee on Finance was persisted in. I understood that motion was withdrawn for the purpose of letting the resolution lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did so state, but was misinformed, and corrected the statement. The Senator from Ohio did not withdraw his motion, but only suspended it for the purpose of allowing the resolution to be printed and laid on the table, renewing it this morning.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the resolution is now printed and on our desks. It will be seen by every Senator that it simply asks the question whether certain reports required by law have or have not been made. It asks for no further information whatever. Of course, upon the answer coming in, other things may follow; but as it now only asks the question whether or not the reports have been made, and as I believe the law requiring them to be made is still in force, I see no reason why it should go to the Committee on Finance or any other committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 35, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Booth, Boutwell, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Clayton, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Dawes, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Robertson, Sargent, Sherman, West, Windom, and Wright—35.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Eaton, English, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Kernan, Key, McCreery, McDonald, Merrimon, Norwood, Randolph, Ransom, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Burnside, Caperton, Dennis, Dorsey, Johnston, Jones of Nevada, Logan, Maxey, Morrill of Vermont, Spencer, and Wadleigh—12.

So the resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair under the rules calls the attention of the Senate to an order lying over, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The CHIEF CLERK. Motion submitted by Mr. WEST, that the request of W. L. McMillen, heretofore claiming a seat in the Senate from the State of Louisiana, for the withdrawal of his credentials from the files of the Senate, be granted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the order.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not know that I have any special objection to the withdrawal of the credentials of this gentleman if he desires to withdraw them; but I cannot understand the object of a request of that kind, to withdraw the credentials, at this time. What is the object of introducing a resolution to withdraw the credentials of a gentleman who has had them presented here, but upon which there has been no action taken? The whole subject has been before the Committee on Privileges and Elections. If the party wishes to resign any right or claim that he may have to a seat in this body, I apprehend this is not the place to make his resignation. I do not, however, rise to interpose any objection, except that it is a very anomalous proceeding. I cannot understand why this application on the part of Mr. McMillen is made at the present session to withdraw his credentials, when they have not been noticed by this Senate except simply to refer them to the Committee on Privileges and Elections and that committee has taken no action upon them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I wish to inquire of the Chair whether the credentials that it is proposed to withdraw are those which were submitted by a Senator as coming from Mr. McMillen or whether they are those which the law requires to be submitted by the executive authority of the State to the President of the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the status of the case.

The CHIEF CLERK. The credentials were presented by Mr. MCCREERY, Senator from Kentucky.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The papers presented by the Senator from Kentucky it is proposed to withdraw.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I have no objection to their being withdrawn; not the slightest.

Mr. THURMAN. What was done with the motion of the Senator from Louisiana?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the motion now pending.

Mr. THURMAN. I only wish to say that it seems to me, without having reflected upon it much, that it is a matter of no consequence whatever whether those credentials be withdrawn or not. Undoubtedly their withdrawal and the acceptance by Governor McEnery of the resignation of Mr. McMillen, which I have seen in the papers, put an end to any claim of Mr. McMillen to a seat in this body; but that can have no effect whatsoever upon the claim of Mr. Pinchback to a seat in this body. His title does not in any manner depend upon what the Senate might decide in reference to the claim of Mr. McMil-

len. Indeed, our committee on this subject reported that neither the body that elected Mr. Pinchback nor the body that elected Mr. McMillen was the lawful Legislature of that State; so that it is very probable that the same Senators who would vote against the admission of Pinchback on the ground that the body that elected him was not the Legislature would also have voted against the seating of McMillen on the ground that the body that elected him was not a lawfully-constituted Legislature. I do not say that would have been the case, but it might have been the case; and I mention it only to show that whether these credentials remain on the Clerk's desk or whether they be withdrawn cannot in the slightest degree affect the question yet to be determined, whether Mr. Pinchback is entitled to a seat in this body.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I confess that I know of no reason now that ought to weigh with me in opposing the passage of this resolution without a reference of it to some appropriate committee, but I make this point: By presenting these credentials to the Senate, this party submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the Senate. Whether he is in condition to make this application does not appear. He may be; he may not be. If the resolution were referred in the regular order of things, the committee could make proper inquiry on that subject, and report for or against it. It seems to me that is orderly, and that is the course it ought to take. He certainly is within the jurisdiction of the Senate. If he has done anything, or if anything has occurred which makes it unwise that he should be allowed to withdraw these papers simply on motion, the committee ought to report that fact.

Mr. DAVIS. I will inquire whether or not there are two sets of credentials of Mr. McMillen before the Senate, one from the governor and one from himself, and which it is he seeks to withdraw, if there be two.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inform the Senator in a few moments, after an examination has been made. [After a pause.] There are two sets. This resolution relates to the set presented by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. McCREERY.]

Mr. MORTON. As far as I am concerned, I am perfectly indifferent as to whether this order is made by the Senate or not; I think it is a matter of no importance whatever; but I hope no committee will be troubled with it, as was suggested by the Senator from North Carolina. These credentials were always the merest sham, the merest pretext in the world. There never was such a Legislature as the McEnery legislature; there never was such a government as the McEnery government. There has been but one government in the State of Louisiana, now recognized by every department of this Government, and it has been recognized by the courts down there. This whole pretense of a McEnery government has been a fraud and a sham from the beginning; and, so far as these credentials are concerned, I am perfectly indifferent whether they are returned to Mr. McMillen, put on the table, or put under the table, or in a waste-basket. It is a matter of no importance whatever.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I concur in a portion of what has fallen from the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] that so far as the pending motion affects the individual right of Mr. McMillen it amounts to very little; but upon a higher plane, affecting as it does the uniform practice of the Senate in parliamentary procedure, it may amount to a great deal. The Senate, therefore, cannot be too cautious in allowing a claimant for a seat in this body to withdraw his credentials, as it might hereafter become a bad precedent. I do not regard the right to withdraw the credentials of a Senator as purely a personal privilege. I do not admit that Mr. McMillen has a right to withdraw these credentials. They constitute a part of the records of the Senate, and are a muniment of title to a seat in this Chamber. These credentials are certified by the governor of each State to the Senate, informing us and designating the individual whom his State has elected as its representative in this Chamber. The governor sends the credentials of every Senator-elect to the Vice-President of the United States, who presents them to the Senate. The governor is the agent of his State in communicating the election of those who have been elected Senators to the Senate itself. The credentials become then the property of the Senate, and not the property of the Senator-elect. Suppose a claimant to a seat in this body desired, for personal or political reasons, to waive his title to a seat in this body, can he do so by asking to withdraw his credentials? Can he by any personal right or act waive the rights of the State which elected him by withdrawing the evidence of his election, committed by law to the custody of the Senate and becoming part and parcel of its records? Other rights than mere personal rights are involved in this motion. A claimant may resign his title, whether perfect or inchoate, to a seat in this Chamber. But I deny his right to withdraw his credentials, because instances may occur when such withdrawal might aid a claimant to a seat in this Chamber who was not elected by withdrawing the credentials which showed that another was the legally-elected Senator of the State. I do not mean to intimate that such is the case here. But this motion is of doubtful propriety. I think, when credentials, properly authenticated by the governor of a State, are received by and placed in the custody of the Senate, that they become a part of the archives of this body, which should not be withdrawn. Let the applicant take a copy, but let the original evidence of election remain where the law has placed it—in the custody of the Senate. I cannot understand why such a motion should be made. I may be in error. It is a question of first impression, and I should therefore have preferred, as it establishes a precedent, that it should have gone to the Committee on Elections. I must therefore vote against the motion. No reasons have been given why the motion is made. As to what the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] said about the utter invalidity and fraud of the McEnery government, I take issue with him on the facts. He says there was not a pretense, in law or fact, that McEnery was ever elected governor of Louisiana. He insists that Kellogg was the only valid and duly-elected governor of Louisiana at the period when the election of McMillen took place. I deny it. The statement of the Senator is contradicted by a report of his own leading political partisans in this Chamber. None know better than the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] that leading and among the ablest republican Senators in this Chamber—after weeks of patient investigation and labor and the examination of very many witnesses—reported to the Senate that the Kellogg government was the creature of the most unblushing usurpation and vilest fraud that ever disgraced and degraded the annals of a free people. Republicans and democrats were alike shocked by the monstrous iniquities under which the Kellogg government was sought, in defiance of the popular voice, to be forced upon the people of Louisiana. That government was the spawn of fraud and violence, no matter by whom it was recognized. Whatever may have been the irregularities or frauds in the McEnery government, they sank into insignificance when compared with those by which Kellogg was, through Federal power, made governor of Louisiana. McEnery was the duly-elected governor of Louisiana, although there may have been, and probably were, fraudulent votes cast for him; still, as between Kellogg and McEnery, we have the highest official republican testimony in this Chamber that the people of Louisiana would have, without Federal interference, acquiesced in McEnery's election. The Senator from Indiana is therefore unsupported by the record in stating that the McEnery government had never the semblance of existence, but was a mere figment of the imagination. It seems to me he is estopped by the report of his own party friends in the Senate on Louisiana affairs, and by the action of his own committee, and by all the history of Louisiana affairs touching the Kellogg election, from the broad statement that the McEnery government was a pretense, a fraud, a mere semblance, while the Kellogg was the only true, valid, legal government in Louisiana. In view of the past history of Louisiana, I wonder at the boldness of this statement. It has nothing solid to rest upon. The McEnery government was the prima facie government of Louisiana, as reported to us by republican Senators and democratic Senators alike; while the Kellogg government was the emanation of fraud, corruption, and violence unsurpassed in the history of any free people, a ribald and barefaced usurpation, which will be a stain upon American legislation so long as the American confederacy endures.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me to inquire to what record he refers?

Mr. STEVENSON. I refer to the record of the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate of the United States, of which the Senator from Indiana was then and is now the distinguished chairman.

Mr. HOWE. Does the Senator from Kentucky say that that committee decided that the McEnery government was the true government?

Mr. STEVENSON. I say that that committee reported that the Kellogg government was a fraud, a usurpation—born in iniquity and established by force! I repeat that the proofs of all this were patent and unanswerable. I say that the late Senator from Wisconsin, the former colleague of the distinguished gentleman who now interrogates me, [Mr. Carpenter,] made an argument in this Chamber—unswervable and unanswerable—in which he demonstrated that the whole Kellogg government was the emanation of a stupendous fraud and a bold, daring usurpation.

Mr. HOWE. I understood the Senator to say that that committee reported that the McEnery government was the true government of Louisiana.

Mr. STEVENSON. O, no; I did not say that. What I did say I repeat, that the Kellogg government was an open, unblushing fraud and usurpation, and that, while the McEnery government was prima facie the government, yet many frauds and irregularities had marked his election. That committee differed in their conclusions, and reached, as I remember, different results. But most of the committee, republicans and democrats, agreed that the Kellogg government, which the Senator from Indiana tells us to-day was the only true, valid government, was a fraud and usurpation. I think, too, a majority of the committee concurred that the McEnery government was the prima facie government of Louisiana.

Mr. HOWE. That the majority of the committee so reported?

Mr. STEVENSON. Such is my recollection. I do not know how the committee were divided. I repeat, however, that my remembrance is that the Senator's late colleague, [Mr. Carpenter,] so long a republican leader in this Chamber, reported ——

Mr. HOWE. Did my colleague say the McEnery government was valid?

Mr. STEVENSON. Your colleague, I think, reported that the McEnery government, so far as the returns went, was the prima facie elected government of Louisiana, and of course the valid government until supplanted under the form of the constitution and laws of Louisiana, which was never done. But your colleague also reported that there were frauds in the election on the McEnery side, which induced him to recommend a new election.

Mr. HOWE. And therefore that that government was not entitled to represent the State of Louisiana.

Mr. STEVENSON. That is your deduction, not mine. The only point I thought of the Senator's interrogation was whether I declared that a committee of this Senate had ever declared in a report to the Senate the Kellogg government to be a fraud and usurpation. I answered that I did so declare upon republican testimony, that should estop the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] and his republican colleagues from impeaching that statement.

Mr. HOWE. Why, Mr. President, let me correct the honorable Senator from Kentucky on one or two points. First, I did not interrogate him anything about the character of the Kellogg government. I understood him to say that the McEnery government was declared by that committee to be the true government of Louisiana.

Mr. STEVENSON. Then you misunderstood the exact scope of my statement.

Mr. HOWE. Then I leave that matter as corrected. The Senator does claim on the authority of that committee, then, that the McEnery government was the true government of Louisiana——

Mr. THURMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. HOWE. Just as soon as I can ascertain the position of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. THURMAN. If the Senators will allow me to say one word both of those Senators will understand what that committee did do. That committee reported that the election of 1872 must be disregarded entirely, or, if it was not disregarded entirely, the only alternative was to sustain McEnery as the lawfully-elected governor. That was what the committee said. My impression is that they did not carry their declarations so far as to include what was called the McEnery legislature, but they did sustain McEnery and the others who ran with him on the State ticket.

Mr. STEVENSON. It has been some time since we went into this Louisiana matter, but I will answer the Senator from Wisconsin by a reference to the record. Here is what his late colleague, (Hon. Matt. H. Carpenter,) JOHN A. LOGAN, J. L. ALCORN, and H. B. ANTHONY said in their report in 1873 on Louisiana affairs:

> It is the opinion of your committee that, but for the unjustifiable interference of Judge Durell, whose orders were executed by the United States troops, the canvass made by the De Feriet board and promulgated by the governor, declaring McEnery to have been elected governor, &c., and also declaring who had been elected to the Legislature, would have been acquiesced in by the people, and that government would have entered quietly upon the exercise of the sovereign power of the State. But the proceedings of Judge Durell, and the support given to him by United States troops, resulted in establishing the authority de facto of Kellogg and his associates in State offices, and of the persons declared by the Lynch board to be elected to the Legislature. We have already seen that the proceedings of that board cannot be sustained without disregarding all the principles of law applicable to the subject and ignoring the distinction between good faith and fraud.
> Your committee are therefore led to the conclusion that, if the election held in November, 1872, be not absolutely void for frauds committed therein, McEnery and his associates in State offices, and the persons certified as members of the Legislalature by the De Feriet board, ought to be recognized as the legal government of the State.

That is a satisfactory answer to the Senator from Wisconsin. His late colleague and three of his associates, leading republicans, did report that the prima facie returns showed McEnery to have been elected, and, as I stated before, that, if the frauds did not invalidate the election, it was the true government of Louisiana. On the same occasion a distinguished Senator, not now a member of this body, from Illinois, [Mr. Trumbull,] went into an elaborate argument to prove that the McEnery government was the true government of Louisiana. And yet the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] boldly tells us that the McEnery government was a fraud, a myth, never having any foundation in law or in fact.

But, Mr. President, I had no intention, when I arose, of being led into the threadbare discussion of Louisiana affairs. I hope they are settled forever. I only rose to correct the statement of the Senator from Indiana that the McEnery government never had the semblance of existence; that it was a thing without form, without pretense of right; a mere fiction in form, in law, and in right. I simply desired to correct that Senator, and, upon the highest republican authority, to deny the fact stated. I desired to recall to that Senator and to the Senate the report of his own party friends, from the committee of which he is chairman, that the Kellogg government, which he tells us to-day was the only valid government of Louisiana, was a fraud and a usurpation, and that the McEnery government, which he terms a fiction, was the prima facie government of Louisiana, and would have been acquiesced in by the people of Louisiana if it had not been overturned and supplanted by the most violent and unblushing usurpation of Federal power ever sanctioned by a free people—a usurpation inaugurated by a Federal judge, with the knowledge, if not with the sanction, of at least one member of the then existing Cabinet.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky and myself are getting nearer and nearer together every moment, and so I am disposed to persevere a little longer. My excellent friend from Vermont sitting near me, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] who is a lesson of prudence to us all, suggests to me that it will not do for me to get too near the Senator from Kentucky, for it might impugn my political character. Nevertheless I am not going to be deterred by that.

The only point upon which I wished in the first instance to take issue with the Senator from Kentucky was upon what I understood to be his statement, and which I think he reiterated just now, that the majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections did declare that the McEnery government was the true government of Louisiana. My recollection of their conclusion was that that title, whether it was prima facie or anything else, which was set up by the McEnery government, was based upon palpable fraud, and for that reason the majority of the committee, and a large majority of the committee, recommended that it should be disregarded; and they also recommended for similar reasons that the Kellogg government should be disregarded. Of that I have nothing to say.

Now, a word upon another point. The Senator from Kentucky says that we are estopped by the report of that committee from disputing the title of the McEnery government. I think he is mistaken about that. He rather undertook to argue that I was estopped by the speeches that my late colleague made here. He is decidedly mistaken about that. I never felt myself entirely estopped by any speech from saying what I thought to be true myself in the Senate, upon the Louisiana or any other question; and certainly, if I were to be estopped by any speech, I should as readily be estopped by such speeches as the Senator from Kentucky makes as by any speeches I have ever listened to upon this floor; for he makes from his stand-point about as conclusive speeches as can be made. The simple fact I suppose is, if I understand the Constitution, that no one Senator has his mouth stopped absolutely, and in a constitutional sense, by the speech of any other Senator, nor even by the report of a majority of a committee.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, without any reference to the merits of the discussion in regard to the State of Louisiana, it occurs to me that the credentials of any person claiming to be a Senator, after having once been placed in the possession of the Senate, cannot be withdrawn by him. He has no personal control over them whatever. They come to the Senate from the executive of the State, and that executive certifies that the State, through its Legislature, has acted upon the subject; and, though his name may be mentioned in the body of the certificate, he has no personal right to withdraw that certificate. It is the right of a sovereign State laying upon the table of the Senate of the United States a certificate certifying that it in its sovereign capacity has exercised a power which it has under the Constitution of the United States, that of electing a Senator. Without reference, therefore, to the question whether the McEnery government or the Kellogg government was the lawful government of Louisiana, it occurs to me that Mr. McMillen, who filed those papers or who had them filed through the instrumentality of a Senator—papers which merely expressed the voice of the State of Louisiana to this Senate—has no right to come here and ask to have those papers withdrawn from the Senate. In that view, I think that the question ought to be submitted to the Committee on Privileges and Elections to ascertain whether any Senator or any person claiming to be a Senator has a right, after his credentials have been presented to the Senate of the United States and referred to a committee, to withdraw them, whether he has any such personal claim to a certificate of election sent here by the governor of a sovereign State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the order proposed by the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. WEST.]

Mr. WHYTE. I move its reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland moves that the order be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. THURMAN. The third section of the act in relation to the election of Senators, approved July 5, 1866, very much strengthens the argument we have just heard from the Senator from Maryland. The commission of a Senator, instead of being delivered personally to himself, as was the case before the passage of this act, is by this act required to be sent by the governor of the State to the President of the Senate. It is no longer treated as his private property. The section reads:

> That it shall be the duty of the governor of the State from which any Senator shall have been chosen as aforesaid to certify his election, under the seal of the State, to the President of the Senate of the United States, which certificate shall be countersigned by the secretary of state of the State.

It seems that the idea of its being a muniment of title to the office in the character of private property is ignored in this act, which requires it to be sent directly by the governor of the State to the President of the Senate, and it belongs to the archives of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland that the order be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. MORTON. I do not see what will be accomplished by troubling that committee with these credentials. They are confessed on all hands to be utterly worthless. What can the committee say about them? I am utterly indifferent, as I said before, whether they are returned to Mr. McMillen or what is done with them. They were always a sham and a fraud. But why trouble the committee with them? Why seek to give them importance? McMillen himself now abandons them, and it is quite time that they should be abandoned here. I did not intend by what I said to bring on a discussion of the Louisiana question. I have heard some strange doctrines of estoppel advanced by the Senator from Kentucky this morning, that the report of a majority of a committee would estop the Senate, and that the speech of one Senator would estop his colleague——

Mr. STEVENSON. Allow me a single word. The gentleman misstates my position. The speech does not estop; but when a Senator rises and says that there is not a shadow of foundation in fact for the existence of a government, then I say that the report of a committee stating a fact that has not been contradicted as to the validity of a particular government ought to estop those who make such a sweeping assertion.

Mr. MORTON. The very report declared that the McEnery government had no existence. I did not say that there was anything of it; but said, on the contrary, that there was nothing of it, that the whole election was a fraud. The Senator falls back on a report which declares that the McEnery government had no existence, and sustains what I said, that these credentials are a mere sham and a mere fraud. The report stated other things that were not correct, that have since been admitted not to be correct by a majority of the men who signed the report. As I said before, every department of this Government, and every department of the State government, and all the courts have recognized that there was but one government of Louisiana, and that was the Kellogg government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the passage of the order proposed by the Senator from Louisiana.

The question being put, the Chair declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. HOWE called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. HOWE. If it is seriously intended to refuse this gentleman the privilege of withdrawing his pretenses from the Senate, it occurs to me that we ought to inquire whether there is some power dormant in the Senate to prohibit him from doing this hereafter. Can we issue a writ of prohibition or something of that kind to prevent his coming in some other day when the Senate is not quite so full as it is now and doing this thing? If he is offending against public justice by this step, there ought to be some power in the Senate to prevent its being done at any time. I do not know but that we may perhaps issue a writ of prohibition, or perhaps a writ of procedendo, or something, requiring him to proceed on his credentials and fight, whether he will or no. Unless we have some jurisdiction, I think we had better let him retire, as he asks to retire. I have always thought he had been here too long.

Mr. THURMAN. I shall vote against this order, for these credentials belong to the archives of the Senate. They are not the private property of the individual named in them. Unless some good reason can be shown for withdrawing a paper that belongs to the archives of the Senate, I shall vote against it. I can see that it may be very proper, especially when it may become important to know the whole history of this transaction, to have this piece of evidence, and that the official papers, or those claimed to be official, which have become part of the files and archives of the Senate, should not be withdrawn. No prejudice to the individual can happen by refusing the motion, while it may, and very properly, be said that these papers, which belong to the files of the Senate, ought not to be taken from them. I shall therefore vote against the resolution of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, it perhaps is not very important, for the proper solution of this vexed question of the representation of Louisiana in this body, what may be the personal action of Mr. McMillen in the case. I do not think it is. As I apprehend, his individual conduct cannot change the right of his State or affect the rights of other claimants. But the question might be asked, and I think its answer will throw some light on the propriety of this motion, into whose custody are these credentials now to be delivered in case the Senate assents to the present motion? And who is the proper owner of these papers? Are they, or are they not, part of the record of the public proceedings in this body? To whom did the Senate make their order for the committal of the custody of these papers? We all know that where a private claimant comes here the order is constantly made, at the application of some member of the body, that his papers may be withdrawn, either for the purpose of renewing the application to another Congress or for any other reason; and the Senate permit it, because those papers go back to the hand which originated them and which is entitled again to receive them. But in the present case from whom did these papers come? They came from the State of Louisiana; they came from a person claiming to be the lawful governor of that State. I find that on the 22d day of January, 1873, by the Journal of the Senate—

Mr. West—

the sole Senator from Louisiana on this floor—presented the credentials of W. L. McMillen, elected a Senator by the Legislature of Louisiana, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of William Pitt Kellogg; which were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

At the same time he—presented the credentials of John Ray, elected a Senator by the Legislature of Louisiana, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of William Pitt Kellogg; which were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

On the 7th of March, 1873—

Mr. West presented the credentials of William L. McMillen, elected a Senator by the Legislature of Louisiana for the term of six years, commencing March 4, 1873; which were read.

Ordered, That they lie on the table and be printed.

I take it for granted the gentleman then representing the State of Louisiana, and the sole representative of that State upon this floor at that time, received them not from this individual, by whom they were not made, to whom they did not belong, but received them in due course of law from the proper authorities of that State. Now, it seems to me that, when the question is asked and when the question is answered which I have propounded, the conclusion ought to be satisfactory to us all that these records may not pass into the hands of any but those lawfully entitled to receive them. It is not Mr. McMillen; it is not the honorable Senator from Indiana. His custody of these papers is nothing more than that of any of us; but they are in his proper custody when committed to his charge as chairman of the committee. But I admit that neither he, nor I, nor any of us, have the right to the personal custody of these papers. They belong to the archives of this body. Mr. McMillen may have duplicates of his own; but the law under which Senators are sent to this body, the law of Congress, prescribes the mode of election and the mode of certification, and I believe part of that law requires that the credentials shall be sent to the Vice-President of the United States. That is the law. Therefore, when he receives them, they are presented to the Senate, they are filed, and they become part of the records; and, without any regard to what may be the effect of the presence or the absence of this particular paper, it would, as I understood my honorable friend from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] just now to state, amount to an absolute mutilation of a public record to withdraw a paper which was sent here from the State of Louisiana, presented here by her authorized agent, the Senator who is now upon the floor, [Mr. WEST,] on the 7th of March, 1873. These papers are not the private property of Mr. McMillen or of the honorable Senator from Indiana, nor of any one of whom either Mr. McMillen or the honorable Senator from Indiana is the representative. They belong to the Senate of the United States, they belong to the people of the United States, whose representatives we are.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I do not want to make an issue with any Senator on the other side upon the title to this valuable piece of property; and if such an issue is to be made, I want it to be tried before some judicial forum, because it is evidently too precious for us to pass upon in legislative form. But I conceive myself that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] is partially right in the remarks he has just submitted. Undoubtedly these papers have come here in a shape which has placed them upon our Journals, and has made them for the time being a part of our records; and if there is any private or any public interest to be subserved by keeping them here, it is the duty of the Senate to keep them here. But every day shows us gentlemen coming in who have presented claims of one sort or another, who have become tired of prosecuting those claims, and who ask leave to withdraw them from the Senate; and, so far as I remember, unless there has been a decision adverse to the claimant, he has been allowed to withdraw them; and if there has been a decision adverse to the claimant, we allow him, by the established usage of the Senate, to withdraw his papers, taking care to protect ourselves against the repetition of a fraudulent claim by retaining copies. Now, here were some papers presented as the foundation of a claim to a seat in this body. Well, if we see fit to retain those papers here we can. The claimant himself, the man who once preferred the claim, has become sick of it, disgusted with it. I want to emphasize the fact, because it is highly creditable to the individual. He asks to withdraw that pretense and the papers upon which it is based. We shall not do him any injustice if we allow him to do what he asks permission to do. Who will suffer by permitting it? The State of Louisiana? Why, what does Louisiana say about it? Who authorized to speak on behalf of Louisiana bases any sort of claim upon these papers? Certainly no one.

It is said that the law requires the governor of a State to send such papers—papers which are to be the foundation for a claim to a seat in this body—to the Presiding Officer of the Senate. I think such is the law. No governor of any State that I ever heard of has sent these papers here. I think I am quite right in point of fact. No governor of any State I ever heard of—I have not heard of all the states in the world, I suppose; but, so far as my reading goes, no governor of any State has sent these papers here.

Mr. THURMAN. I beg the Senator's pardon. He is mistaken about that.

Mr. HOWE. Am I?

Mr. THURMAN. It has been very common indeed for Senators to present the credentials of their colleagues who were elected; but they have been sent direct to the President of the Senate.

Mr. HOWE. Undoubtedly, repeatedly. The Senator misunderstood me. I say no governor of any State ever sent these papers here on which Mr. McMillen based a claim to a seat.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator speaks of that.

Mr. HOWE. Yes; we certainly cannot injure Louisiana, because Louisiana does not send any such pretense here. Louisiana has too much regard for her own credit and her own character to set up such a pretext. There is but one other party who can possibly be injured by allowing this withdrawal, and that is the party referred to just now by the honorable Senator from Delaware for the first time. That is the party known as the people of the United States. It was intimated by him, if I understood him, that the people of the United States had a right to insist upon keeping these credentials here. That is so; and, if I thought they would insist upon it, I should vote against giving permission to withdraw them; but I am satisfied that the people of the United States will condone the offense, will pardon the act, if we let Mr. McMillen take this spurious paper off our files this morning. So I shall vote to give him the permission he asks.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I wish it again distinctly understood that the effect of making this order upon the right of any other claimant to a seat in this body from Louisiana is, in my opinion, absolutely nothing. I wish it to be understood that I consider it can have nothing to do with it, one way or the other; but there is a question of regularity which, having been raised, I think should be decided correctly. Is this credential a private or a public paper? Is it an official document or is it the private paper of the individual claimant or of his individual friends? Is it, or does it not purport to be, the official certificate of State action in regard to so important a matter as membership in this body? Certainly all these inquiries must be answered in the affirmative. It is a public paper; it is a credential, made in accordance with law, and has been presented to this body by the proper agent of the State of Louisiana, the Senator who now sits upon the floor. He has presented it; he has had it ordered to be printed and laid on the table.

Now, in this case, to illustrate this question, suppose I, or any other member of the body, should ask leave to withdraw my credentials; what would the Senate say? The wisdom or the unwisdom of my request matters not; it is the propriety, or the contrary, of granting it that the Senate is to decide upon. My credentials are part of the records of this body, and the Senate has no right, either on my application or any other application, to change the truth of facts as they appear upon the records and by the Journal of the Senate.

I do not mean to intimate that any ulterior object is in view by the honorable Senator who has made this motion, because I will give him credit, with his well-known intelligence and ability, for comprehending that it would be impossible to affect the right of another claimant under a totally different government by the action of this individual, Mr. McMillen, who, as the Senator from Wisconsin says, has become disgusted and tired and weary of pursuing his rights before this body. Whether that shall be held hereafter a subject of reproach to this body or to him, is a question that the people of this country will decide; for, if he has come here with just rights, and they have been disregarded, then upon those who have disregarded them will rest the condemnation of justice, when justice shall be had and heard. But in this case it is plain that neither the credentials of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, nor mine, nor those of any other duly and regularly elected member of this body can be withdrawn with propriety. As a matter of fact there are duplicates, and probably a duplicate in possession of the party, should he desire from curiosity or interest to hold it; or copies may be had by him if he desires to possess them; but the original papers belong to this body, that is to say, they belong to the Government of the United States, of which this body is a part, and we are the custodians, and we have no right to give them up, because they are public property.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, in making the suggestion which I did at the commencement of this discussion, that there might be some impropriety in adopting the order proposed, I was not prompted by any desire to have Mr. McMillen seated as a member of this body. I believe I have never advocated his admission to a seat on this floor, either in this body or in the Committee on Privileges and Elections, of which I have the honor to be a member. But it did occur to me that there was some impropriety at least in allowing an applicant who has come here claiming a seat in this body to withdraw on his own petition the certificate of his election. I could not exactly see how it could affect in any way the rights of any other applicant to a seat, and I was not clear in my own mind at that time that there would be any great impropriety in permitting the order to pass; but I am now satisfied, after the discussion we have heard, that we should do injustice to the records of the Senate in mutilating them by permitting the withdrawal of the certificate of election of Mr. McMillen by the State of Louisiana.

I have no disposition to enter into the discussion of the Louisiana question; I had hoped that we were done with that question; but it does strike me as being highly improper that we should at this time permit this gentleman on his own petition to take from the files the certificate of his election as a member of this body. I shall therefore vote against this order.

Mr. BAYARD. I merely rise to ask leave to read the act of Congress on this subject of the certificate, to be found at page 312 of the Manual:

SECTION 3. That it shall be the duty of the governor of the State from which any Senator shall have been chosen as aforesaid to certify his election, under the seal of the State, to the President of the Senate of the United States, which certificate shall be countersigned by the secretary of state of the State.

In this case a certificate purporting to be the certificate of the governor of the State of Louisiana, under the seal of the State, countersigned by the secretary of state of the State, was presented to the Senate by the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. WEST,] and it was then ordered to lie on the table and be printed, which was done; and therefore in that way, under a public law, it became part of the records of the Senate.

Mr. HOWE. It is upon that fact that the Senator from Delaware and myself are at issue. Undoubtedly it is the duty of the governor of a State to certify credentials. What I said, and what I repeat, was that no governor has ever certified these credentials.

Mr. BAYARD. Now the honorable Senator simply begs the question.

Mr. HOWE. I state the fact.

Mr. BAYARD. He begs the question, and he begs the whole question, and, without his being estopped in the least, he is perfectly aware that whether Mr. McEnery was or was not the governor of the State of Louisiana is a fact that this Senate have not yet settled, because they have certainly for two years past refused, in respect of that part of the case which the Senate can take cognizance of, to recognize the appointee of his opponent, Mr. Kellogg.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator is entirely right, I believe. This Senate has not settled the question whether McEnery is Governor of Louisiana or not. I do not know that this Senate has settled the question whether Taylor is governor of Wisconsin or not. There are several governors upon whose title this Senate has not passed; but I think the Senator will agree with me that, although the Senate has not settled the question, there is not a Senator on the floor who does not know that McEnery is not and never was governor of Louisiana.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not know, so far as personal knowledge goes; but I believe in my soul (and I know it so far as I know any fact which I believe from information) that that man was and is to-day the lawful choice of the people of that State, duly elected, and kept from his place by the usurpation of Federal power, under the order of the President of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the Chair state the exact question on which we are called to vote?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. STEVENSON. I thought there was a motion made to refer these credentials to a committee. Has that been passed upon?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion was negatived. The question now recurs on the passage of the resolution. Does the Senator desire that it be read?

Mr. STEVENSON. No, sir. I only desire briefly to state that I utterly disavow any feeling of partisanship as to the past in regard to the contest in Louisiana. I shall vote against the withdrawal of these credentials because I believe them to be a part of the records of the Senate. I do not recognize and do not acquiesce in the legal proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin, that the credential of a sovereign State, in this Chamber of equals, rests upon the footing of a mere private claim.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 30, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Clayton, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, McMillan, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Paddock, Patterson, Robertson, Sargent, Sherman, Spencer, West, Windom, and Wright—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Dawes, Eaton, English, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Kernan, Key, McCreery, McDonald, Merrimon, Norwood, Randolph, Ransom, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—28.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Booth, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Dennis, Dorsey, Hamilton, Jones of Nevada, Logan, Maxey, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Oglesby, and Wadleigh—14.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Then I ask that the correction be made in the RECORD, and I give notice that on the first Monday on which we are in session I shall offer to put this bill upon its passage on the second call of the States, as I presume the gentleman will not yield to let me make that motion now.

EMPLOYÉS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. FORT. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That in all subordinate appointments, under any of the officers of this House, it is the judgment of this House that wounded Union soldiers, who are not disabled from performance of duty, should be preferred.

I ask that this resolution shall be now considered, and upon it I call the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the call for the previous question will be voted down.

The question was then taken on seconding the call for the previous question; and upon a division there were—ayes 97, noes 134.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. FORT called for tellers on seconding the call for the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. FORT and Mr. HARRISON were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 99, noes 126.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. COX. I offer an amendment to the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FORT,] and then I will move that both the resolution and the amendment be referred to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. FORT. Has the gentleman the floor at this time?

Mr. COX. I think you are voted down.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] having surrendered the floor when he called the previous question.

Mr. FORT. The State of New York has been called and passed.

The resolution proposed by Mr. COX was then read, as follows:

Resolved, That inasmuch as the Union of the States has been restored, all the citizens thereof are entitled to consideration in all appointments to offices under this Government.

Mr. COX. I call the previous question on my motion to refer the resolution and amendment to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. CONGER. On the motion to refer I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The first question is upon seconding the call for the previous question.

Mr. FORT. I would like to hear the gentleman from Ohio or from New York, whichever it is, [Mr. COX,] debate his resolution.

Mr. COX. We are now dividing on the call for the previous question.

Mr. HALE. Is the resolution of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] introduced as a substitute for the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FORT?]

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands it to be offered as an amendment.

Mr. HALE. And therefore the House is voting on the resolution of the gentleman from New York as an amendment to the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. RANDALL. As I understand, the question is upon the motion to refer.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the reference.

Mr. HOAR. Has the sense of the House been taken upon seconding the call for the previous question?

The SPEAKER. It has not; that is the first question to be submitted to the House.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Can the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] introduce a resolution at this time, the State of New York having been called and passed?

The SPEAKER. It is too late to raise that question now.

Mr. FORT. I submit whether that objection was not raised at the time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. COX. I object to anything except a division of the House.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I understood the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] to raise that question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not so understand.

Mr. FORT. I tried to do so as soon as I could get on my feet.

Mr. HALE. Has the House acted on the question of amending?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. HALE. Should that not be acted on first?

The SPEAKER. That would be acting now on the subject-matter of the resolution, which is not the purpose of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] who moves to refer both resolutions to a committee; and the question is on the reference, upon which the previous question has been demanded.

Mr. HALE. As the House has not acted on the amendment, is it before the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that it is.

Mr. COX. I have called the previous question on the motion to refer. Gentlemen have acted ad captandum on this question. I propose now to test the matter. My proposition is in the nature of an amnesty.

The SPEAKER. The question is on sustaining the demand for the previous question.

Mr. HALE. On what?

The SPEAKER. On the motion to refer the resolutions to the Committee on Accounts. The Chair hopes there will be no further interruptions until this question is disposed of.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question recurring on the motion of Mr. COX to refer—

Mr. CONGER called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to raise a question of order. It is that neither the resolution nor the amendment is a proposition to pass a law or to adopt a resolution directing any officer of this House or other officer of the Government to do any act; that the pending propositions present nothing which this House is authorized or required by law to do.

The SPEAKER. In the judgment of the Chair, if the objection of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] were ever tenable, it comes too late. The Chair therefore overrules it.

The question being taken on agreeing to the motion of Mr. COX, there were—yeas 168, nays 102, not voting 29; as follows:

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON subsequently said: I ask unanimous consent to have printed in full in the RECORD the joint resolution introduced proposing an amendment of the Constitution of the United States. I have been told that it will kill me politically, and I am satisfied if it is understood it will not have that effect.

No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

The joint resolution is as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, (two-thirds of each House concurring therein,) That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid as a part of the Constitution, namely:

Mr. KASSON. Is that a resolution to inquire into the expediency or a resolution of instruction?

The SPEAKER. It is merely a resolution to inquire into the expediency.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to say a few words on that resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois introducing the resolution demands the previous question, and debate is not in order.

Mr. CONGER. Does he ask it to be put on its passage at this time?

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Is this a bill?

The SPEAKER. It is merely a resolution that the Committee on Military Affairs inquire into the expediency of what is suggested, and the gentleman introducing the resolution demands the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

No. 180) for the location and construction of a military wagon-road from Green River City, Wyoming Territory, to the Yellowstone National Park and to Fort Ellis, Montana Territory; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Territories, and ordered to be printed.

CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION.

Mr. COX. I am requested by the United States Centennial Commission, and also the centennial board of finance, to present a memorial asking for an appropriation. I will not ask to have it read, but, as it is short, I will ask for it the courtesy of being printed in full in the RECORD, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Centennial Exposition when appointed.

No objection was made.

The memorial is as follows:

Memorial of the United States Centennial Commission and centennial board of finance.

To the Congress of the United States:

The undersigned memorialists, a joint committee of the United States Centennial Commission and the centennial board of finance, respectfully represent:

That the commission was created by act of Congress dated March 3, 1871, and is composed of two commissioners from each State and Territory, nominated by the governors thereof and appointed and commissioned by the President. The board of finance was created by the act of Congress of June 1, 1872, and is composed of stockholders in the capital raised for the purposes of the commission.

Under the act, the duty of the commission is to "prepare and superintend the execution of a plan" for holding "an exhibition of American and foreign arts, products, and manufactures," "under the auspices of the Government of the United States," in Philadelphia, in 1876.

July 4, 1873, the President, in obedience to the act cited, made proclamation of the character, time, and place of the exhibition, and, "in the interest of peace, civilization, and domestic and international friendship and intercourse," commended the celebration and exhibition to the people of the United States, and "to all nations who may be pleased to take part therein."

A circular note of the same date, in like obedience to law, transmitted said proclamation and the general regulations of the commission "to the diplomatic representatives of all nations."

January 23, 1874, the President appointed a board of seven officers to prepare for the exhibition such articles, materials, and processes as will show the working of the Departments in peace and the resources of the nation in war. Congress appropriated half a million dollars for this purpose, and the board has erected its own buildings.

June 5, 1874, to settle certain questions of construction, Congress requested the President "to extend, in the name of the United States, a respectful and cordial invitation to the governments of other nations to be represented and take part in the international exhibition."

June 16, 1874, Congress authorized the Mint to furnish appropriate commemorative medals to the commission at cost.

June 18, 1874, Congress authorized the free importation of articles intended for exhibition—duties to be collected in case the articles should be disposed of in the United States.

And during the last session Congress appropriated $32,000 for the preparation by the Treasury Department of a certificate of stock for the board of finance.

The Centennial Commission formally organized March 4, 1872, the board of finance May 10, 1873; and, guided by the six several acts of Congress and the proclamation and orders of the Executive, they have diligently labored to prepare an exhibition worthy of the nation and the occasion. The law requires them to report from time to time. Two hundred and thirty acres have been inclosed within the three thousand acres of Fairmount Park. Within the inclosure will be not less than 150 buildings. The exhibition buildings proper will afford nearly 60 acres of flooring, the largest covering 21.47 acres. The machinery hall, 14 acres—an admirable structure—is finished. The three largest of the others are well advanced, and there is no doubt whatever that all will be ready in time.

Eight or nine foreign commissions will erect twelve or thirteen ornamental edifices for offices, reception-rooms, &c. Some of these are built. Sixteen or seventeen States have engaged to put up similar structures—in some cases large enough to hold exhibits of their resources and products.

We are obliged to treble the space intended for the fine arts, chiefly by reason of the contributions from abroad. Though our plans have all been enlarged, applications in general are much in excess of our room. The management is compelled to choose the best and reject many.

The transportation of men and goods to and about the grounds, lodging and feeding visitors, the facilities of travel about the city, and every other imaginable problem, have received full attention. The arrangements, having the benefit of others' errors, are deemed the best ever made on such an occasion.

Thirty-eight foreign governments, for themselves and their many provinces, colonies, and dependencies, have, in the spirit of true comity, signified in most friendly terms their purpose to participate. They have appointed commissioners of high social and scientific ranks, and, as we know unofficially, have made very liberal appropriations of money. Several nations are obviously making unusual efforts, and have more than once applied for additional space.

The National Government imposed upon us the honorable duty of conducting this great work, and likewise of procuring the money therefor. The appropriation for engraving and printing our stock certificate is the only direct pecuniary aid the Government has given.

Our financial condition (more in detail in the accompanying official statement of the board of finance) may be stated as follows:

Required to carry the work to the opening day, $6,724,850.

Total stock subscriptions reliable, including New Jersey, $100,000; Delaware, $10,000; Connecticut, $10,000; New Hampshire, $10,000; Wilmington, Delaware, $5,000	$2,357,750
Gifts, concessions, and interest	230,000
Further concessions	100,000
Appropriated by Pennsylvania	1,000,000
Appropriated by Philadelphia	1,500,000
Deficiency	1,537,100

It was justly argued that the exhibition should, as far as possible, be supported by the people. Struggling against a remarkably prolonged financial depression, the enterprise has arrived at a point whence we can predict for it a splendid success. In beauty, appropriateness, and convenience of situation; in the number, variety, extent, grace, and grandeur of the buildings; in the range of thought and industry exhibited; in the universality of foreign participation; in the attendance from all parts of the country, the exhibition will be greater than its promoters dare to predict.

We point to what has been done with a confident hope of your approbation. The expenditures have been made with economy and care; not a dollar of debt remains due and unpaid, and our estimates have never been exceeded; wherefore we think our judgment of future necessities may be received with trust.

It is our duty, under the law, to keep you advised of our progress. You know the condition of business among your constituents. Our efforts to raise money have never been relaxed to this day; but we need not explain why we have not quite reached our aim; the completion of our task through the and of the people alone; subscriptions have slackened because of a prevalent belief that the time has arrived when Congress may justly and wisely assist.

Wherefore we pray your honorable body to appropriate to us one and a half million dollars, with which we can complete perfectly all our preparations, and open the exhibition on the appointed 10th of May, 1876, without debt, leaving the current expenses thereafter to be paid by receipts.

We are only the servants of the Government, carrying out its orders in celebrating the centennial anniversary of the national independence, and conducting, in the words of the law, "an exhibition of the natural resources of the country and their development, and of its progress in those arts which benefit mankind, in comparison with those of older nations."

The peculiar occasion attracts universal attention.

The best products of all nations will be here. American progress in art, science, and manufactures; American resources and capabilities; American life, education, and character, and the effect thereon of our soil, climate, and political institutions, will be the subjects of study and report by able men from all quarters. The great value of such exhibitions has been proved. Their purpose is the advancement of the people by the most direct methods of diffusing useful knowledge. They promote international fraternity and peace. The celebration and exhibition of 1876 afford a grand opportunity to renew among ourselves the bonds of brotherhood and patriotism.

Permit us to refer to the necessity of early action and to entreat your careful consideration of a question that appears to concern closely the pride and honor of the country.

In behalf of the United States Centennial Commission:

JOS. R. HAWLEY, President.
A. T. GOSHORN, Director-General.
D. J. MORRILL, Chairman Executive Committee.

In behalf of the board of finance:

JNO. WELSH, President.
HENRY WINSON, Director.

I ask that they be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on the Centennial Exposition when appointed.

No objection was made.

The memorial is as follows:

CINCINNATI CHAMBER OF COMMERCE AND MERCHANTS' EXCHANGE,
December 11, 1875.

At a regular session of the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce, held this day, the following preamble and resolution was adopted:

Whereas the United States Centennial Commission and centennial board of finance have petitioned Congress for aid in continuing the preparations for the Centennial Celebration and Exposition, to the amount of a million and a half of dollars; and whereas the city of Cincinnati has warmly espoused from the first the idea of celebrating the nation's one hundredth birthday in a grand and becoming manner, our citizens having, without any local jealousy, conceded the location of the celebration to be an eminently fitting one in a historical point of view: Be it therefore

Resolved, That this body renew their assurances of most cordial sympathy with the patriotic enterprise, and that our congressional representatives be earnestly requested to support the Centennial Commission in its petition for aid.

C. M. HOLLOWAY, President.

WHISKY FRAUDS.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to submit the following resolution, on which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to this House copies of all letters, telegrams, orders, and instructions relating to the organization and prosecution of the present movements against the so-called "whisky rings" at Saint Louis, Chicago, and Milwaukee.

Mr. KASSON. If I understand this resolution correctly, it calls for information from the Treasury Department, in which case I shall have something to say upon it. I ask, therefore, that it may go over under the rule. Any resolution on this subject should be very carefully worded to save the interests of the Government now pending.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to the resolution lying over. I hope, however, that to-morrow the gentleman will not object to its adoption.

Mr. KASSON. I make no objection to anything consistent with the successful prosecution of proceedings now pending.

Mr. RANDALL. The first effort on the part of this House should be to be well informed.

Mr. HOAR. Is not the effect of this resolution to expose to the "whisky ring" the purposes of the Government?

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir.

Mr. HOAR. It appears to be.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the resolution goes over.

EZRA B. BARNETT.

Mr. MILLER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 193) for the relief of Ezra B. Barnett, postmaster at Norwich, New York; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

The bill, which was read, provides (two-thirds of each House concurring therein) that all the political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States by reason of participation in the rebellion shall be removed from Samuel Cooper, jr., of Virginia.

Mr. CONGER. Has any request been made in the usual form asking for the removal of political disabilities?

Mr. HUNTON. I have a petition in writing, which, if called for, I will have read.

Mr. CONGER. I only wish to know there is such a petition in writing.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed; two-thirds voting therefor.

COURT OF COMMISSIONERS OF ALABAMA CLAIMS.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Mr. Speaker, I move, by unanimous consent, to take from the Speaker's table an act (S. No. 78) to extend the duration of the court of commissioners of Alabama claims, for passage at this time.

There was no objection.

The bill, which was read, in the first section provides that the existence of the court of commissioners of Alabama claims, created by the act entitled "An act for the creation of a court for the adjudication and disposition of certain moneys received into the Treasury under an award made by the tribunal of arbitration constituted by virtue of the first article of the treaty concluded at Washington May 8, A. D. 1871, between the United States of America and the Queen of Great Britain," shall be continued and extended to the 22d day of July next, with the same effect, and no other, as if said last-named day had been named in said act for the termination of the powers of said court, and said act is continued in force during said period.

The second section provides that the powers of the clerk of said court are extended for an additional period, not to exceed two months from and after the termination of the existence of the court, for the purpose of closing his accounts, depositing the records, documents, and all other papers in the possession of the court or its officers in the Office of the Secretary of State, as provided in said act; and all disbursements made by him during this period shall be under the direction of the Secretary of State.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill. It merely extends the time for closing the business now before this court. I suppose there is no objection.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I hope the gentleman from Connecticut will withdraw his demand for the previous question to let me make a brief statement.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I do not yield the floor, but will hear what the gentleman has to say.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Mr. Speaker, I have been recently in receipt of letters from prominent citizens of California who have claims which ought to be acted on by this court of commissioners, but which claims for some reason or other have not been submitted for adjudication. They desire to be heard; and I submit to the gentleman that he make this a special order for to-morrow at any hour he may please, so that I may have an opportunity to present the papers in these cases, which are now at my room, as I could not expect this bill would be called up to-day.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. The Secretary of State, who has this matter specially in charge, presented it fully in the papers accompanying the President's message. It appears the claims presented are in such number that this court cannot possibly consider and decide them before the 22d of January next, when the court expires by limitation of law. The Secretary of State and the court of commissioners are anxious the claims already submitted under the award shall be disposed of. If we go into the question whether we shall take up all cases of insurance and premium risks not now before the court, the time fixed for its existence will run out, and we shall then lose all it has already done. Let me suggest to the gentleman from California in regard to these claims which have not come in—the claims of sailors away at sea, and like cases which have not been presented for adjudication to this court—that I have no doubt this House will pass upon them effectually in some other form. In accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of State, and of the President in his recent annual message, we must provide for the extension of the court beyond the 22d of January next, or else we shall lose what has been done for many months past. I hope, therefore, he will withhold objection to the passage of this bill at this time. At all events, I must insist on my demand for the previous question.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Will the gentleman from Connecticut answer me one question?

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. LUTTRELL. When will this act expire?

Mr. STARKWEATHER. On the 22d of January. There will probably be an adjournment in the course of a few days, and we may not be back in time to take up a new bill, or to amend this bill. That this bill may become a law, and that this class of claims may be passed upon, we must adopt it now.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Will it not do to take it up to-morrow?

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman from Connecticut yield to me for a moment?

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COX. I beg to state very briefly to the House that the amount received from Great Britain in July, 1873, to pay for the damage done by the Alabama, Florida, and Shenandoah, was, in gold, $15,500,000. Add interest at 5 per cent. to the 1st of January, 1876, $1,937,000, and premium on gold at 15 per cent., $2,325,000, and the present value in currency is $19,762,000. The judgments rendered by this commission to the 9th of December, 1875, amounted to $5,836,805.66; the claims that remain undecided amount to $3,400,000; together, $9,236,805.66; balance in Treasury, $10,426,194.34. As the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. STARKWEATHER] has well said, all this work will go for nothing unless we extend the time. There are many claimants who cannot be here in time, and who cannot file their claims, without this extension of time. I hope there will be no objection to the passage of this bill.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STARKWEATHER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TAX ON CHECKS.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask leave to present a petition for the repeal of the two-cent check-stamp tax, from 30,219 persons, resident in thirty-three States and five Territories. I do not ask for its printing. [Laughter.] I ask that it may be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

EQUESTRIAN STATUE OF LAFAYETTE.

Mr. HOAR. I ask that the petition of B. H. Kinney, regarding the equestrian statue of Lafayette, be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It is very short; and, as this is an interesting historical matter, I hope there will be no objection.

There was no objection.

The petition is as follows:

Memorial of B. H. Kinney.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

Your memorialist, a citizen of the United States, believes that a large majority of the inhabitants of this country desire to have a suitable national monument erected in honor of the timely and valuable services rendered by General Lafayette and other French officers, soldiers, and marines to these United States in their struggles for liberty during the war of the Revolution with Great Britain for Independence.

Therefore he respectfully requests that your honorable bodies appropriate the sum of $100,000, to be paid to him in annual installments, as the work progresses, to enable him to construct such a monument, consisting of an equestrian statue, of heroic size, of Lafayette, surmounting a massive pedestal, embellished with statues of other distinguished French officers and soldiers, and bas-relief panels representing important scenes in which they took part, all to be of bronze metal, upon a base of granite.

He would further represent that this is a renewal of a memorial addressed by himself to the Thirty-sixth Congress on the same subject, and not renewed on account of the unsettled condition of the affairs of the country until the present time, and that the difficulties and expenses of obtaining the likenesses and other accurate details for this monument are rapidly increasing.

B. H. KINNEY, Sculptor.

WORCESTER, MASSACHUSETTS, December 11, 1875.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House adjourn, but I waive that motion for the present that an opportunity may be given to clear the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MOREY] has been recognized and has the floor.

ERROR OF ENROLLMENT.

Mr. MOREY introduced a bill (H. R. No. 195) to correct an error of enrollment; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. ATKINS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 196) to repeal the act of February 8, 1875, entitled "An act to amend existing customs and internal-revenue laws, and for other purposes;" which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to ask leave of absence for the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. DURHAM, who by reason of sickness in his family has been necessarily absent from the House since the day of its organization, and may be absent some ten days longer. He asks that the leave of absence may be made retroactive to the extent indicated.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CALDWELL] asks leave of absence for his colleague, Mr. HAYS, who has been called home on account of sickness in his family.

There was no objection.

MATILDA BARNETT.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia, Mr. HUNTON, asks permission for Mrs. Matilda Barnett to withdraw from the files of the House papers filed by her relative to the revolutionary claim of James Barnett.

Mr. CONGER. Has there been any adverse report?

Mr. HUNTON. I think not.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request being granted?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Let it be with the understanding that there has been no adverse report.

The SPEAKER. With that understanding the request is granted.

TREADWELL S. AYRES.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] asks leave to withdraw, under the rules, from the files of the House papers in the case of Treadwell S. Ayres, of Memphis, Tennessee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose the object of this is to have the papers referred to the proper committee. If so, it is not necessary to ask action from the House.

Mr. COX. The object is to send them to the Senate; that is all.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is a matter which has been pending in the House for some time. The rule requires that when papers are withdrawn copies be left.

The SPEAKER. The request is for leave to withdraw the papers under the rules.

There being no further objection, the request was granted.

CHARLES A. BLAKE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MCCRARY] asks leave to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of Charles A. Blake, late chaplain United States Army. The notice says that there has been no adverse report thereon.

There was no objection.

ANNE C. LIVINGSTON.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York, Mr. SCHUMAKER, asks that Mrs. Anne C. Livingston be permitted to withdraw her petition from the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. CONGER. Wherever there has been an adverse report in any of these cases, I should object to the withdrawal.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to this request being granted on condition that there has been no adverse report?

There was no objection.

SOUTH PASS OF MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the fourth section of the river and harbor act of March 5, 1875, a report of the recent inspection of the work done on the South Pass of the Mississippi River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

ROBERT TANSILL.

Mr. DOUGLAS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 198) to relieve the disabilities of Robert Tansill, of Prince William County, Virginia; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. CONGER. I would suggest that the bill should be amended by the insertion of the word "political" before "disabilities." He may be under disabilities from which the House does not desire to relieve this man.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I supposed that that would be inferred, but I will accept the amendment.

The amendment was accordingly made; and the bill, as amended, received its several readings and was passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

THOMAS W. TANSILL.

Mr. DOUGLAS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the petition of Thomas W. Tansill for settlement of his accounts, and the accompanying papers, be withdrawn from the files of the Clerk's office and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. RANDALL. I now insist on my motion that the House adjourn.

Mr. WRIGHT. John E. Woodward, of Kentucky, had at the last session of Congress a claim for certain tobacco seized by Brigadier-General E. A. Paine, a military officer of the United States, during the war of the rebellion. This claim was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and reported upon adversely by them. I now present some additional papers in the case, which, it is claimed, help out the point on which the case was ruled before. I move that the papers on file in the office of the Secretary be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with the petition which I now present.

Mr. WRIGHT. Seeing a great many applications this morning for the withdrawal of papers and their reference to the Committee on Claims, as well as to other committees, I wish to make one suggestion. Very many of those cases were reported upon at the last Congress. In some of the cases the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the bill or the matter referred to it, upon some technical ground; in other instances, however, there were adverse reports, and those reports were adopted. Now, by a rule of the Senate, there cannot in strictness be a re-reference of those matters unless there be additional testimony presented. I call attention to this matter. I do not refer to the cases of my friend from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] at this time, but generally. In all these cases, of course it is next to impossible that Senators can know whether there be additional testimony; and perhaps they have not the time nor the opportunity to look up and ascertain what is the condition of the record; but I beg of them, in behalf of the Committee on Claims, that there shall at least not be a re-reference of these matters indiscriminately to the committee where there have been adverse reports, and where such reports have been adopted. We have enough upon us in all conscience without being burdened with those matters which have been investigated and re-investigated and which are again referred to us without additional testimony.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask that the following order be entered. I make the motion by request. I know nothing of the case:

Ordered, That the heirs of Colonel David Hopkins have leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate the petition and accompanying papers in the claim of said Hopkins, and that they be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, provided no adverse report has been made.

The order was agreed to.

PAY OF CLAIMANTS FROM LOUISIANA.

Mr. WEST. I ask for the reference of the following order:

Ordered, That the Committee on Contingent Expenses be instructed to report what amounts of compensation, if any, are, in their opinion, due to the respective contestants, William L. McMillen and John Ray, claimants to a seat in the Senate for the unexpired term of William P. Kellogg; and to William L. McMillen as claimant heretofore to a seat in the Senate for the term commencing March 4, 1873.

I move the reference of this order to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

DEATH OF SENATOR JOHNSON, OF TENNESSEE.

NATIONAL AND STATE RIGHTS.

Mr. MORTON submitted the following concurrent resolutions; which were read:

1. Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the people of the United States constitute a nation, and are one people in the sense of national unity.

2. Resolved, That the Government of the United States is not a compact between the States in their municipal and corporate characters, but was formed by the people of the United States in their primary capacity; that the rights of the States are defined and guaranteed by the Constitution, and not by any outside theory of State sovereignty; and that the rights of the States cannot be enlarged or diminished except by an amendment to the Constitution.

3. Resolved, That the rights of the States have the same sanction and security in the Constitution as the rights and powers of the National Government; and that local domestic government by the States within the limits of the Constitution is an essential part of our free republican system.

4. Resolved, That the doctrine that a State has the right to secede from the Union is inconsistent with the idea of nationality, is in conflict with the spirit and structure of the Constitution, and should be regarded as having been forever extinguished by the suppression of the rebellion.

Mr. MORTON. I move that the resolutions be printed and lie on the table, and at some convenient season I will ask the Senate to take them up with a view of voting upon them.

The motion was agreed to.

THE MISSISSIPPI ELECTION.

Mr. MORTON. I offer the following Senate resolution:

Whereas it is alleged that the late election in Mississippi for members of Congress, State officers, and members of the Legislature was characterized by great frauds, violence, and intimidation, whereby the freedom of the ballot was in a great measure destroyed, a reign of terror established, ballot-boxes stuffed, spurious tickets imposed upon voters, so that a popular majority of more than twenty-five thousand was overcome, and in its place was given an apparent, but fraudulent, majority of more than twenty-five thousand; and whereas the Legislature thus chosen will have the election of a Senator to represent that State in this body; and whereas, if these allegations are true, a great number of the citizens of the United States will have had their rights under the Constitution and laws of the United States wickedly violated: Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators be appointed by the Chair to investigate the truth of the said allegations and the circumstances attending said election, with power to visit said State to make their investigations, to send for persons and papers, and to use all necessary process in the performance of their duties; and to make report to the Senate, before the end of this session, of their investigation and findings.

Mr. BAYARD. Let the resolution lie over and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over and be printed.

JOINT RULES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I offer the following resolution about re-adopting the joint rules, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Rules, to inquire into the matter:

Resolved, That the joint rules of the Senate and House of Representatives in force at the close of the last session of Congress be, and the same are hereby, adopted as the joint rules of the two Houses for the present session.

I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules. I think the subject needs inquiry and investigation as to the present condition of the rules between the two Houses.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask the honorable Senator, as his experience in the body is greater than my own, if this is the customary method of extending the rules from Congress to Congress, or whether it be necessary to adopt such a resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That, as a celebrated Englishman said, is past finding out. The object of this resolution is to ascertain from the proper Committee on Rules whether the joint rules that were in force at the last session of Congress are in force now without any vote; and, if so, upon what principle of law or joint proceeding; and, if not, of course to take some steps to have some joint rules between the two Houses.

Mr. BAYARD. Is this resolution to be referred?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is my motion, that it be referred to the Committee on Rules for inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

INFRACTIONS OF INTERNAL-REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. STEVENSON. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to the Senate copies of all letters, telegrams, orders, and instructions relating to the organization and prosecution of alleged infractions of the internal-revenue laws at Saint Louis, Chicago, and Milwaukee, if not deemed incompatible with the public interest.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That had better lie over.

Mr. SHERMAN. But before it lies over, as it would on the objection of any Senator, I wish to appeal to the Senator from Kentucky, to his good sense, to his desire to promote the investigations which are now being made into the whisky frauds, and to his desire to facilitate the exposure and punishment of all guilty persons, whether he does not see, on reflection, the impolicy of calling for information that will enable every guilty man who is not yet indicted and arrested to escape the punishment of his crime. I have noticed that in another place resolutions have been offered calling for information as to criminal prosecutions now going on and as to criminal prosecutions now being zealously pushed by the officers of the Government. Why should this information, obtained in secret, so necessary to be preserved in secret, be called for by either House of Congress, to be printed and exposed, I will not say for the purpose—for I know such is not the purpose of the Senator from Kentucky—but with the manifest effect of enabling every man suspected or accused of crime to escape the country and avoid punishment?

Now, sir, of all the information that could be called for from the Executive Departments, there is none that should be withheld for stronger reasons than the information called for here. Why, sir, if the information now called for by this resolution were sent to the Senate, there would be the end of all the prosecutions against the whisky ring, against men who are violating the revenue laws. I know that my friend from Kentucky does not desire this, but that he is serious and earnest in wishing to punish all offenses against the United States, and I hope that he will withdraw this resolution, and not even allow it to lie on our table. If he does not withdraw it, I shall object to its consideration at the present time, and shall object to its passage; for I believe its passage would be unwise. It is sufficient to know—the Senator from Kentucky knows it, because a distinguished citizen of his own State is now taking the active lead in punishing these offenses with an energy and vigor that demand our admiration, and not our suspicion—that every officer of this Government, from and including the President down, who is charged with this duty, is now pursuing it against friend and foe; and I trust they will all pursue it until every guilty man is punished.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I have as much confidence in the present Secretary of the Treasury as any Senator in this Chamber. I cordially concur in all that has been said by the Senator from Ohio as to his integrity and his intrepid zeal in the prosecution and exposure of fraud wherever it exists. I have no fear but that he will continue to bring to light all violations of the revenue laws of the United States, whenever or wherever he has reason to believe they exist. I have also great faith in the wisdom of the present Secretary of the Treasury; and therefore the resolution I have offered leaves it to his discretion to submit such information as he deems proper. I am quite sure that the Secretary will submit to the Senate no information that would at all militate against the public interest or retard for one moment his earnest, manly efforts in bringing to justice recently discovered violators of the internal-revenue laws at Saint Louis and Chicago. If I thought my inquiry would have that effect, I would instantly withdraw the resolution. If the Senator from Ohio thinks so, I will move the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Finance, so that he and his colleagues on that committee may have an opportunity of consulting with the Secretary, and thus all the danger which he seems to apprehend will be avoided.

I can well imagine that a great deal of information interesting to us and to the country might be laid now before the Senate which would not tend in the slightest degree to retard or embarrass pending investigation. Far, very far be it from me to weaken or impede the praiseworthy efforts of the Secretary of the Treasury in exposing and bringing to justice all violators of law. On the contrary, the whole country honors him for what he has done and what he is still doing in this particular, and none more than myself. Honesty in the public service is the crying popular need of the hour, and, so far from retarding, I would rather do all in my power to strengthen and support the Secretary in his earnest efforts in that direction. I do not think my resolution will have that effect, and I hope it will be referred to the Committee on Finance. I am sure the Senator from Ohio will not object to that.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to its being referred to the Committee on Finance if any Senator desires such a reference, but it is apparent from the reading of the resolution that it ought not to be adopted. It calls on the Secretary to disclose all that he has gathered together, all the threads, and webs, and criminal ends and aims, and objects and steps of the various conspirators who have entered into a combination against the Government. Such a disclosure would be the worst step that could be taken if, as I know is the case, the Senator desires the whisky ring to be prosecuted and punished. And the reason I spoke so promptly about it was that I happened to learn this morning that the Secretary of the Treasury, if called upon for information of this kind and required to give it, even under the limit that is now put on the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky, would be exceedingly embarrassed, and indeed he could not perform the duty imposed on him by the resolution without violating his sense of public duty. I may say that much as from him without violating any confidence. How can he get this information without recalling it from the cities named, where it is about to be used in the trial of pending cases? How can he discriminate and select alone such information for us as will not be incompatible with the public interests? That which appears of no importance may prove to be the key of the whole conspiracy.

Sir, this "whisky ring" will be prosecuted to the end by all the power of the Government, and every man connected with it, I believe, will be punished who can be reached by the ordinary course of the civil and criminal law. But it seems to me that it is wise to let it rest with the executive authorities, unless the Senate is suspicious that the powers of the Government will not be duly used in pursuing these transactions, and I do not believe that any Senator here has any doubt about that. I do not care to have the resolution referred to the Committee on Finance, because I think it ought to be disposed of by the Senate.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am somewhat surprised at the Senator from Ohio. The resolution only asks for information which the Secretary of the Treasury deems it compatible with the public interest to communicate. The Senator from Ohio seems to think that the Secretary of the Treasury will, under this resolution, be compelled to communicate information which would defeat his plans and weaken the prosecutions at Saint Louis and elsewhere. The resolution contemplates no such thing. It asks for no information which, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury, would be incompatible with the public interests. All who know that officer know that he would communicate not one jot or tittle of information which would embarrass him or weaken the prosecution. The resolution leaves to his discretion how much, if any, he will send to the Senate. If the public interest requires that no information shall be communicated, then the Secretary will give us none. If he thinks certain information can be sent without embarrassment or public detriment, why then he will send it to us. The resolution contains a simple request for information on certain subjects, and confides to the Secretary of the Treasury whether any or how much shall be sent in. That is the whole of it. If the resolution be referred to the Committee on Finance the Secretary of the Treasury will have the aid of that committee in determining what information and how much he shall communicate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, it occurs to me that this whole resolution—and I say it with great respect to my friend from Kentucky—proceeds upon a misapprehension. It is true it contains the limitation that we are not to have any papers and evidence touching crimes which, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, it may not be wise, for the public interests, to produce; but I submit to the Senate, with some considerable confidence, in respect to every controversy of the Government with any criminal or violator of the laws, that until he is tried it is not compatible with the public interest to make public a single paper or document or particle of evidence. No Secretary of the Treasury, no Attorney-General, no Senator, no district attorney having the matter in charge can with certainty say in advance whether it is safe to make public one paper or another paper, one piece of information or another piece of information, until he sees what connection that may have, when all the threads are brought together upon the trial, with the guilt or innocence of the accused person. It might be that the communication to us of a paper by the Secretary of the Treasury or any other Department of the Government, which at this moment would appear to be perfectly free from objection in respect to carrying on these prosecutions with success and safety, would be the key that would unlock the means of escape to the parties who are implicated in this great whisky conspiracy, and whom, of course, the Senator from Kentucky would be as sorry as I to see get away.

There is no safety at all, therefore, as it seems to me, for the public interests in making public any of the papers and documents of the Government connected with its administrations in executing the laws against persons accused of crime. What would be thought of a resolution proposed here by any of us calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury to give us all the evidence he has got in some suit upon a bond against a surety where some pretended defense was set up, or against some counterfeiter, or against any other one of the ten thousand instances of persons breaking the laws? You cannot carry on business in that way. I do not think in any State the public authorities ever thought of making public the evidence which was being accumulated by the prosecuting officers against criminals, in advance of the trial, because I repeat that it is impossible to know, as it appears to me, in advance of the trial, whether a particular piece of evidence or a particular paper may not be of great injury to the public interest if it be made public before the time that it is brought into connection with the other circumstances in the case.

I should hope, then, although there is no objection to this reference, that we should all vote against this resolution on the spot, and take the risk of the good people of the United States thinking that we belong to the "whisky ring," or any other ring, on that account. I think we are sometimes getting a little too sensitive in doing our duty lest somebody outside of this Chamber, with good motives or ill motives, should think that we were proceeding upon some effort to screen some party friend or to expose some party enemy, rather than proceeding upon our sense of public good and in the exercise of a public duty. So proceeding, I am ready to vote against this resolution now.

Mr. THURMAN. I was not in the Senate when the resolution was offered. I ask that it be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The resolution was read.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I have seen in the papers some telegrams touching these prosecutions, and touching gentlemen employed by the Government to conduct them. Their publication does not seem to have been deemed incompatible with the public interest. But as there seems to be an opinion with Senators for whom I have great respect, and in whose experience I have great confidence, that this might embarrass the Secretary, I move the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Finance. There, I am sure, there can be no doubt that the subject will receive that consideration that it ought to receive; and the chairman, on communication with the Secretary of the Treasury, can let us call for just so much as he shall deem not incompatible with the public interest, and no more.

Mr. CONKLING. I should not be willing to vote to refer such a resolution as this to any committee of this body even if it did not relate to undetermined prosecutions for crime, and for a reason which appears on the face of the resolution itself. I submit to my honorable friend from Kentucky, that he has entirely confounded two things in this resolution which do not belong to each other at all. He addresses a resolution to the Secretary of the Treasury. Who is he? Not one of the branches of the Government, not one of the three departments of the Government; but an executive officer, created by the appointment of the Senate as well as by the appointment of the President. He is an executive officer of the Government; and the Senate and the House of Representatives, by custom immemorial, direct him, not request him, to send to either House such information, such facts as the respective Houses deem to be valuable and suitable for publicity. On the other hand, when we address a resolution to the President, he being one of the three branches of the Government and having in this regard equal dignity and equal privileges of judging with one or both Houses of Congress, we, in the language of this resolution, request him and at the same time commit to him a measure of discretion by saying, as the Senator has said in this resolution, that we confide to him the question whether the transmission of the information sought will or will not consist with the public interest. Everybody, I think, upon the bare statement can see the propriety of this. The President addresses a communication to us. He leaves something to our discretion. It is a request if he could call upon us for information. We address a communication to him for information. It is a request we confide to his discretion in the measure that I have indicated.

But now, the Senator from Kentucky feeling, and naturally feeling, the hazard I will not say the impropriety of directing to be uncovered to the public view the facts pertaining to untried issues and undetermined criminal prosecutions, undertakes in the resolution to request the Secretary of the Treasury to determine for himself and for us whether or not it would be proper to make known to us this information, and then to send it to us with such measure and with such stint as he, one of the executive officers of the Government, may determine for the Senate as well as for himself.

I submit that such a resolution never ought to be passed. It is not only in discord with precedents and usage, but it is in discord with the manifest reason of the thing. The Senate should not direct one of the officers of the Government to do an act or to send information until the Senate is willing to take the responsibility of saying that the act should be done or the information should be sent.

Mr. BAYARD. How can they judge of that until they get the information?

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator asks me a very pertinent question, admitting of a very conclusive answer, I submit to him. They can do it, when a case arises, by simply addressing the President of the United States in the language employed in this resolution, which is appropriate to him, as I have endeavored to explain, he being one of the branches of the Government, and not addressing it either to the Secretary of the Treasury or to any other executive officer, whatever his official stature may be, for nevertheless, as the Senator from Delaware knows without my reminding him of it, be his dignity what it may, he is not one of the co-ordinate branches of the Government, and is not to be treated as if he were. Therefore, I would submit in the line of the suggestion made by the Senator from Delaware, that if this resolution were worth while at all, it should go to the President, and commit to him the privilege of judging—undoubtedly the Secretary of the Treasury would participate with him in judging—whether this information should come here or not.

But, passing beyond this objection, I am quite willing to stand with the Senator from Vermont and determine this question as we may as lawyers and legislators we ought to determine it, and not to determine it in view of the fact that some individual or some coterie of individuals somewhere may indulge in a fling suggestive of the idea that the Senate did not want to turn on the lights and unmask to the great American eye all the facts about "the whisky ring." Any man who ever acted as public prosecutor—I see more than one Senator who did—knows, without information from me, the folly at any time before the trial and the last trial is concluded in which evidence is involved, of spreading it unnecessarily before the public. It can do no good; it may do much harm; and I submit to the honorable Senator from Kentucky that the only reason which could exist for this resolution he himself has emphatically disclaimed. If he doubts, or if he disbelieves that each officer charged with this duty, from the highest to the lowest amenable to us, is doing all that he can do, with rigor, with diligence, with fidelity in this regard, then and only then, I submit, is it worth while for him to summon him to account in order that we may, as a court of review, consider and pass upon his suspected dereliction. There is no such thing in this case, and no Senator can have that excuse for voting for this resolution. As my friend from Vermont suggests, and I hardly think too strongly, it is in virtue and effect directing the Secretary of the Treasury upon pain, if not of public displeasure, at least of public censure in the way of criticism, to turn over all the evidence and all the papers that he has; for the idea with the fever that there is in the country on this subject of expecting the Secretary of the Treasury to sit down and examine critically every telegram and ravel out the threads and send just so much as can safely come here, withholding all the rest, is to impose upon him an undertaking which we ought not to impose; which he could not execute, which he would not undertake to execute, and which, I think, were the Senator from Kentucky in his place, he would avoid by taking the Senate at its word and sending in lump the information which we seemed to have called for. Therefore, I hope, Mr. President, this resolution will not be referred to a committee. I think if the Senator wishes it to be voted upon, we had better vote upon it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, there must be some purpose entertained by the Senator from Kentucky in offering this resolution. The Senator must be under the impression that there has been some information withheld from the public by the Secretary of the Treasury or by the President of the United States which it is important that the public should have; that the ends of justice require that some publication should be made of correspondence or telegrams. Now, sir, I do not believe that there is any foundation for this suspicion, but for one I am perfectly willing that the fullest and largest publication shall be made which does not interfere with the ends of justice, which will not have the effect to defeat prosecutions which have been commenced or which are yet to be instituted. I believe that any publication that can be made will show to this country that the Secretary of the Treasury and all his subordinate officers have displayed the clearest and the strongest purpose to bring guilty men to justice and to break up and punish these frauds. I believe that this publication will vindicate the Administration from all the charges that have been made of an attempt to cover up or protect criminals or men who have been engaged in violating the revenue laws. I believe this publication will have the effect of vindicating the President of the United States from all charges that have been made against him, and showing that he has given the fullest support, that he has given his aid and countenance in every respect to these prosecutions without sparing friend or foe, but treating all alike, without regard to personal association, political friendship, or any connection whatever that may have existed in the past. I believe my friend could not do the Administration a greater service than to have this publication made, and so far as I am concerned I am willing to vote for this resolution, leaving the matter to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury to withhold from publication such documents or papers the publication of which would be premature and might prevent the administration of justice. I am willing to leave that to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury; and with that understanding I shall vote for the resolution.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, it seems to me that this discussion is "much ado about nothing." The resolution is not dangerous. It is one of simple inquiry; one which, as I have already said, leaves it entirely to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury just how much information he thinks the public interest will allow him to communicate. I know of no man to whose judgment I could more safely intrust this discretion than to the Secretary himself. It is a simple request. I want no information which might tend to weaken or embarrass the Secretary. All who know me know that; and, in order to make this sure, I agreed that the resolution should be referred to the Committee on Finance. Hence I am surprised at all this opposition to a simple inquiry, and especially surprised to deny even a reference of the resolution to a committee. Gentlemen seem indisposed to submit the simple inquiry for information to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury or to refer it to the Committee on Finance. It is a very usual inquiry.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. STEVENSON. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator says he does not think it an unusual resolution. I should like him to inform the Senate if he knows any precedent for it, where evidence has been called for by this body, which is in effect turning it over to the persons accused or suspected, in respect of any criminal prosecution contemplated or in progress.

Mr. STEVENSON. I think I might turn to many precedents requesting the Secretary of the Treasury to give the Senate official information; I will not say in cases where prosecutions were pending, because I cannot recall at this moment such a case.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the very point.

Mr. STEVENSON. But let me tell the Senator from Vermont that his inquiry begs the question; because the resolution offered by me asks for no information which the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury thinks it would be impolitic to communicate. The Senator from Vermont assumes that the Secretary of the Treasury will give us information or make public facts that might or would weaken his hands in the prosecutions now pending in Saint Louis. I have a higher opinion of the wisdom and ability of the Secretary of the Treasury than to believe he will do any such thing. I have no fears on that subject. I apprehend that General Bristow knows better than anybody else can exactly the status of these prosecutions. He knows whether he can safely communicate or not. His judgment is the sole standard of what he will communicate. The resolution asks for no information which he believes should be withheld. It seeks for nothing that would embarrass him or impede the criminal prosecutions now pending. But if the Secretary had information which without detriment might be communicated, Senators seem to desire that it should not be done. They seem unwilling that the resolution should be referred either to the Secretary or to the Committee on Finance. I have heard of no possible objection to the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Finance and can conceive of none. Surely that committee and the Secretary of the Treasury together could determine what information was proper or not to be communicated.

I desire, in conclusion, to say that I have no feeling on this subject. I have seen certain telegrams in the papers touching the dismissal of a distinguished advocate who had successfully aided the district attorney in successfully prosecuting certain violators of the revenue laws. It seems that the publication of these telegrams was not deemed impolitic. Whether such dismissal was judicious or impolitic cannot be determined without the facts. I thought that certain information might be transmitted without detriment to the public interest. Hence my resolution. I was willing to confide the extent and character of the information to the Secretary of the Treasury. But gentlemen seem to think that it might possibly impede the prosecutions; that it might embarrass the Secretary of the Treasury. Desiring to do neither, I will withdraw the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is withdrawn.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there is no other legislative business, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After an hour and two minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at two o'clock and seven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 15, 1875.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. There being no committees to be called to-day, it is now in order again to call the States and Territories in their order for resolutions, under which call bills also may be introduced upon leave for reference to their appropriate committees.

WITNESSES IN UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. FRYE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 199) to make persons charged with crimes and offenses competent witnesses in the United States courts; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

OWNERS OF SHIP JOHN CARVER.

Mr. FRYE also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 200) for the relief of Oliver Moses, Frank O. Moses, Galen C. Moses, Charles Owen, and Robert P. Manson, all of Bath, and George W. Edge, of Richmond, Maine, owners of the ship John Carver; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. HALE submitted the following preamble and resolution, upon which he called the previous question:

Whereas the country is suffering under the evils of an irredeemable currency, which causes uncertainty in business and stimulates speculation, to the prejudice of legitimate business and labor; and whereas both political parties in the United States stand committed against repudiation and in favor of a speedy return to specie payment; and whereas Congress established a like policy in the act of March 16, 1869, which was followed by the act of January 14, 1875, providing for the resumption of specie payments on the 1st day of January, 1879: Therefore,

Resolved, That, in the judgment of this House, prompt legislative measures should be taken to render the said act of January 14, 1875, effective, by placing in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury whatever power may be necessary to that end.

The question was upon seconding the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the call for the previous question shall not be sustained, will it be in order to move the reference of this resolution to the appropriate committee?

The SPEAKER. That motion will then be in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will make that motion.

Mr. HALE. This is not a bill for legislation, but merely an expression of opinion. Gentlemen on the other side may consign it to the limbo of a committee if they choose, but I think it important to have action upon it at the present time. I hope the previous question will be seconded.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Is it in order to move that this resolution be laid on the table?

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I make the motion.

Mr. HALE. And I call for the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I would inquire of the Chair whether this resolution is not of that peculiar character that necessarily should be considered by a committee, as it directs legislation?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not regard that as a proper parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HALE. In other words, the gentleman wants to put it off.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I do not wish to put it off. I am ready to meet this question as thoroughly as the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] but I am opposed to mere empty, vain declarations; I want the subject to be considered by the appropriate committee.

Mr. HALE. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JONES] to lay my resolution on the table.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. HALE. I object to the withdrawal of the motion. It is a very good motion to test the question upon.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I am ready myself to meet this question at once.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky has the right to withdraw his motion.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I will not withdraw it. [Laughter, and cries of "Withdraw!" "Withdraw!"] So far as I am concerned, gentlemen know my opinion: I am ready to meet this question now; but, under the advice of friends, I would prefer that the resolution be referred to a committee; and hoping some gentleman will make that motion, I will withdraw my motion to lay the resolution on the table.

The SPEAKER. The motion to lay on the table having been withdrawn, the question now is upon seconding the call for the previous question upon the adoption of the resolution of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. HALE. And upon that question I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HALE, and Mr. JONES of Kentucky, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 75, noes 143.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that this resolution be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency when appointed.

The motion was agreed to.

BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. JOYCE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 201) to repeal the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," and all acts amendatory thereof; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM LAMB.

Mr. JOYCE also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 202) for the relief of William Lamb, late a private in Company C, Eleventh Vermont Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

MAILABLE MATTER OF THIRD CLASS.

Mr. JOYCE also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 203) fixing the rate of postage on all mailable matter of the third class at one cent for each two ounces or fraction thereof; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN R. HARRINGTON.

Mr. JOYCE also (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. No. 204) for the relief of John R. Harrington; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

DAVID OGDEN AND OTHERS.

Mr. JOYCE also (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. No. 205) for the relief of David Ogden, Andrew Foster, and other ship-owners; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, with accompanying papers, and ordered to be printed.

SETH BONNEY.

Mr. TARBOX introduced a bill (H. R. No. 206) to amend the record of military service of Seth Bonney; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL CURRENCY.

Mr. EAMES introduced a bill (H. R. No. 207) to amend the several acts providing a national currency, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

MARVIN H. AMESBURY.

Mr. PHELPS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 208) for the relief of Marvin H. Amesbury; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGE F. SELLECK.

Mr. PHELPS also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 209) for the relief of George F. Selleck, late lieutenant Fifth Regiment Connecticut Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MAILABLE MATTER OF THIRD CLASS.

Mr. STARKWEATHER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 210) to amend the law relating to postage on articles of mailable matter of the third class; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I move that the rules be suspended and this bill put on its passage.

Mr. RANDALL. I believe the motion for a suspension of the rules cannot be entertained on this day. It requires unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill now.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. The introduction of bills is in order under this call.

Mr. RANDALL. Does the gentleman demand the previous question on the bill?

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the previous question will be voted down, and that the bill will receive the consideration of a committee.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I ask for the reading of the bill. I should not demand the previous question but for the fact that there is a universal desire that transient newspapers shall, as soon as possible, be placed where they were before the change of the law.

Mr. RANDALL. In reply to the gentleman I will say that I am quite as willing as he is to place such newspapers back where they were before, by a mistake on his side of the House, the law was changed.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. A mistake on both sides.

Mr. RANDALL. There are other objectionable features in the law to which this bill refers. That law increased, in the interests of a monopoly, the postage on packages of merchandise, &c., passing through the mails. I wish to have the law in that respect also restored.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I am with the gentleman in favor of all measures of reform. He says that we made a mistake. He did the same; and he is now making a mistake in objecting to the repeal of an enactment which he says was passed by mistake.

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir; I want that law reviewed by this side of the House, and put in proper shape by a committee, so that we may pass a measure curing all the abuses of your legislation.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. This bill comes from the Post-Office Department.

Mr. RANDALL. I am not quite certain whether the Post-Office Department did not assist in that very infamous legislation.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I am quite certain they did not.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Does this bill restore the law to where it was?

Mr. STARKWEATHER. It does in regard to transient matter. I demand a suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. What is it?

The SPEAKER. That a motion to suspend the rules is not in order under this call.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I call the previous question on the passage of the bill, and on that motion demand a division of the House.

The House divided; and there were ayes 85, noes not counted.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. RANDALL and Mr. STARKWEATHER were appointed.

Mr. CONGER. The bill has not been read, and we are proceeding out of order until it has been read.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I wish to have the bill read. It simply repeals——

Mr. RANDALL. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. CONGER. I want to have the bill read.

Mr. RANDALL. The House is dividing, and the gentleman is not in order.

The SPEAKER. This kind of proceeding is very irregular, but the Chair will ask whether there is objection to the present reading of the bill?

Mr. CLYMER. I object.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a point of order. I make this point of order——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan is not in order.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. What is it?

Mr. CONGER. That the reading of a bill must be granted once at least on the demand of any member.

The SPEAKER. Not pending a division of the House by tellers.

Mr. CONGER. But the demand for the reading of the bill was made before the previous question was called.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear any demand for the reading of the bill until it was made by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOAR. The demand was made on that side of the House.

The SPEAKER. The demand comes too late.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 69, noes 128.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. RANDALL. I now move to refer the bill to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads when appointed.

Mr. HOAR. I now ask for the reading of the bill.

The bill was read.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I ask that the bill be ordered to be printed.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to refer the bill to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads when appointed, and that the bill be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GENEVA AWARD.

He also introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 12) in regard to the surplus revenue; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

GENERAL M. C. MEIGS.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and on it call the previous question:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish this House with a list of claims pending in the Quartermaster-General's Department at the time when leave of absence was granted to General M. C. Meigs, which have since that date been passed and allowed, with the date and amount of such allowances; and also any report or statement in regard thereto made by General Meigs or by the Acting Quartermaster-General.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REMOVAL OF DISABILITIES.

Mr. RANDALL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 214) to remove the disabilities imposed by the third section of the fourteenth article of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that the bill may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of each House concurring therein,) That all disabilities imposed and remaining upon any person by virtue of the third section of the fourteenth article of the amendments of the Constitution of the United States be, and the same are hereby, removed, and each and every person is hereby forever relieved therefrom.

SEC. 2. Whenever any persons from whom disabilities are removed by this act shall be elected or appointed to any post or office of honor or trust under the Government of the United States he shall take the oath prescribed by section 1757 of title 19 of the Revised Statutes of the United States or such other official oath as may be hereafter prescribed in such cases by any future act of Congress.

Mr. RANDALL. If there be no serious objection to this bill on the other side of the House, I will demand the previous question on its passage.

Mr. BLAINE. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will permit a reference of that bill. I do not know—and I am not prepared to speak for this side of the House as to that—that any combined opposition will be made to it; but there are certain observations in regard to the subject of the bill which some gentlemen on this side of the House may desire to submit; and I am disposed to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, upon the general proprieties of legislation in regard to a bill of this magnitude, to allow it to be referred. I can assure the gentleman that no factious opposition in any shape will be made to its having a fair vote.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is something in the language which I think ought to be corrected.

Mr. RANDALL. It is not my purpose to press this proposition with any undue haste. My excuse for having asked that it be proceeded with and acted upon at this time is this: At the last session of Congress, upon the motion of a gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. Maynard, the House unanimously passed this bill. I did not suppose that, in consequence of the change of a political character which the House has undergone, there would be any objection from that side. But it is enough for me to know that gentlemen desire to discuss it or that they desire delay. I will therefore consent to the reference, or, if the gentleman from Maine prefers, I will ask that it be made a special order for consideration on Thursday morning immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. BLAINE. I would be glad if the gentleman would assign it for a day after the holidays.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to have the holidays sincere, so that every man in this country may feel that he is relieved from all past disabilities.

Mr. BLAINE. I should dislike very much to do anything that would deprive the gentleman from Pennsylvania of the most joyous holidays; but I think he has had several pleasant holidays since I have known him with these gentlemen under disabilities.

Mr. RANDALL. I have enjoyed them always, but some have been debarred from their enjoyment. I want this to be a centennial holiday in fact and in spirit.

Mr. BLAINE. I would be very glad, if the gentleman would consent to its going over, to agree to the earliest day in January he chose to assign for it.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not consent to that.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the gentleman then indicate some day next week?

Mr. RANDALL. I will indicate Tuesday of next week, immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is satisfactory.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to this bill being made a special order for Tuesday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

JOHN G. PARR.

Mr. JENKS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 215) granting a pension to John G. Parr; which was a read first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

HENRY SCHUETBERG.

Mr. JENKS also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 216) granting a pension to Henry Schuetberg, of Indiana, Pennsylvania; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

DONATION OF CONDEMNED CANNON.

Mr. COCHRANE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 217) donating condemned cannon and cannon-balls to the Ladies' Monumental Association of Allegheny County, Pennsylvania, for monumental purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. COCHRANE. I ask the previous question on the passage of this bill.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. THORNBURGH. I make the point of order that the bill must go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is made too late.

The bill was read a third time, and passed.

SURVEY OF PACIFIC RAILROAD.

BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. HOPKINS also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 220) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," and a supplement thereto; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

PORTS OF ENTRY.

Mr. HOPKINS. I offer the following resolution, upon which I move the previous question:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to furnish this House with a list of the ports of entry in this country at which the amount of duties received is less than the expense of maintaining such ports of entry, together with a statement of the distance from such several ports of entry to the nearest port which is self-sustaining.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

ELIZABETH R. M'CRACKEN.

Mr. O'BRIEN introduced a bill (H. R. No. 221) granting a pension to Elizabeth R. McCracken, widow of Dr. Robert McCracken, late acting assistant surgeon of the United States Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

NAVIGATION OF VIRGINIA RIVERS.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I offer the following resolution, upon which I move the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce, when appointed, be instructed to inquire into the propriety of recommending an appropriation to improve the navigation of the Mattapony and Pamunkey Rivers, in Virginia, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

LIFE-SAVING STATIONS.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I offer the following resolution, upon which I move the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce, when appointed, be instructed to inquire into the propriety of amending the third section of chapter 344 of an act for the establishment of life-saving stations and houses of refuge on the sea and lake waters of the United States so as to increase the compensation of keepers of stations, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I ask consent to introduce for consideration at this time a bill to remove the political and legal disabilities of George Watson Carr.

The SPEAKER. Is there a personal application for relief from this party on file?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I am not prepared to say that his application is on file. His application was made to me during the last Congress, and I know that it was filed.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia, in the absence of such application, desire the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The application was made to me and was in my custody during the last session of Congress, but I cannot lay my hand on it at this time.

Mr. HURLBUT. I must object to the consideration of the bill until the application is before the House.

SIGNAL-SERVICE.

Mr. HUNTON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 222) to extend the observations of the Signal-Service of the Army so as to benefit the public health; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

Mr. HUNTON. I present and ask the immediate passage of a bill to relieve D. B. Conrad, of Virginia, from his political disabilities. I hold in my hands his petition asking for the removal of his disabilities.

No objection being made, the bill (H. R. No. 223) received its several readings and was passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

PHILIP ROHR.

Mr. TERRY introduced a bill (H. R. No. 224) for the relief of Philip Rohr; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

JURISDICTION OF CIRCUIT COURTS.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 225) to give the circuit courts a supervisory jurisdiction over the district courts in certain criminal cases; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

CONSOLIDATION OF UNITED STATES BONDED DEBT.

Mr. WALKER, of Virginia, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 226) to consolidate the bonded debt of the United States and to reduce the interest thereon; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

LONGEVITY ALLOWANCE OF ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. WADDELL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 227) to equalize the credits of officers of the Army in computing longevity allowances of pay; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PAYMENTS TO DISLOYAL PERSONS, ETC.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 228) to repeal a joint resolution of March 2, 1867, and the act of February 4, 1862, prohibiting payments to any person not known to be opposed to the rebellion; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I ask that this bill be considered at this time, and upon it I call the previous question.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Let the bill be reported at length.

The bill was read. It repeals the joint resolution of March 2, 1867, prohibiting all payments to any person not known to be opposed to the war between the States, generally called the rebellion, and the act of February 4, 1862, authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to strike from the pension-rolls the names of such persons as have taken up arms against the Government, and all other laws of similar character and purport.

Mr. HOLMAN. That bill is very broad in its provisions. I trust that it will be referred to the proper committee.

Mr. KASSON. Certainly it ought to be referred; it involves millions.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. The substance of this bill has already passed the House several times, once in the form of a bill providing for the restoration to the pension-rolls of the soldiers of 1812.

Mr. HOLMAN. Only one feature of this bill was contained in the bill to which my friend refers, the feature relating to persons who have been on the pension-roll. This bill goes far beyond that. It not only repeals the joint resolution of 1867, but all laws bearing upon the subject. I do not think it safe to legislate upon such a matter without examination by a committee.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I will then move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

PENSIONERS OF WAR OF 1812.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina, also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 229) to amend the act granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812, and ordered to be printed.

TAX ON TOBACCO.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina, submitted the following preamble and resolution, upon which he called the previous question:

Whereas the tobacco trade is liable to derangement by reason of uncertainty in regard to the possible legislation of this Congress concerning the tax on that commodity, and it is desirable to quiet injurious apprehensions on this subject: Therefore,

Resolved, That this House declares its purpose to allow no legislation which may in any way modify the existing internal-revenue tax on tobacco to go into operation prior to July 1st, 1876.

Mr. COX. Is that a joint resolution?

The SPEAKER. It is a House resolution.

Mr. COX. Does it come in conflict with any existing law?

The SPEAKER. It simply declares the purpose of this House on the subject referred to.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. It merely proposes to postpone until the 1st of July next the operation of any law which may be passed upon the subject. I hope the resolution will be adopted.

Mr. REAGAN. I would renew upon this the question of order I raised yesterday upon another subject: whether this resolution does not propose to direct or affect the action of some officer or Department of the Government. It is an expression of opinion which might be proper for a town meeting, but not for Congress.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands this resolution to be simply declaratory of the judgment of this House.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. I hope I may be allowed to say one word. The only purpose of this resolution is to assure those engaged in the tobacco trade that we will not interfere with the tax upon that commodity until July next, and that they can be certain that any legislation we may pass modifying the tax shall not go into operation till then, and they can go ahead without fear. There is no harm in the resolution; but it will enable everybody to know what to calculate upon.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon seconding the previous question upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. COX. I think the resolution should go to a committee. I do not propose to tie my hands in regard to future legislation.

The question was taken, and the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. COX. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON FREEDMEN'S AFFAIRS.

Mr. RAINEY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Rules:

Mr. HILL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 234) restoring to the pension-rolls the name of James Buchanan, of Blakely, Early County, Georgia, first lieutenant of Georgia militia in the Florida Indian war of 1836, and whose name was dropped from the rolls under the act of February 4, 1862; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

MODIFICATIONS OF REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. HILL also presented, by unanimous consent, a memorial of citizens of Union County, Georgia, for a modification of the revenue laws; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, ordered to be printed, and also ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

The memorial is as follows:

STATE OF GEORGIA, UNION COUNTY:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States Congress:

The undersigned, citizens of Union County, Georgia, respectfully represent that they are suffering grievously from the present mode of enforcing the internal-revenue laws, which laws they respectfully petition your honorable bodies to repeal or so modify as to relieve the people from the evils from which they so sorely suffer. These laws, as now enforced, are impoverishing the people and enriching corrupt officials, without any commensurate benefit to the Government. For alleged frivolous violations of these laws hundreds of poor men, who are unable to buy their way out of prison, are being torn from their families and incarcerated for months in felons' cells, thereby suffering what we think is "cruel and unusual punishment" for such offenses. Should the repeal of these laws be deemed inexpedient, as one modification, which would tend greatly to the relief of the people from unnecessary suffering and injury, we respectfully ask a change of the statutory period of limitation for the prosecution of offenses against these laws from five to two years. This, with such other modifications of the existing law as will readily occur to wise legislators, would relieve the country from many of the evils from which it now suffers, and to this end we invoke the consideration of our Representatives in Congress to this question.

I. M. ROGERS, Justice of the Peace,
ELLIOTT BOLING, Coroner,
and many others.

No. 236) to give the consent of the United States to the appropriation of certain proceeds arising from the sale of the swamp and overflowed lands in Alabama, for the purpose of furnishing other and additional accommodations for the indigent insane and idiotic persons resident in said State; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Freedmen's Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF HOMESTEAD LAW.

Mr. LEWIS also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 237) to amend the homestead law approved May 20, 1862; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

RESTRICTIONS IN DISPOSITION OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. MOREY introduced a bill (H. R. No. 238) to repeal section 2303 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, making restrictions in the disposition of the public lands in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

OATH OF OFFICE.

Mr. MOREY also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 239) to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. MOREY. I desire action on this bill now. Let it be read in full, and then I shall ask the previous question.

The bill was read. It provides in the first section that hereafter every person elected or appointed to any office of honor or profit under the Government of the United States shall, before entering upon the duties of said office and before being entitled to any of the salary or emoluments thereof, take and subscribe the following oath or affirmation: "I, A B, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that to the best of my knowledge and ability I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this oath freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter: So help me God." Which said oath, so taken and signed, shall be preserved among the files of the court, House of Congress, or Department to which the said office may appertain; and any person who shall falsely take the said oath shall be guilty of perjury, and, on conviction, in addition to the penalties now prescribed for that offense, shall be deprived of his office and rendered incapable forever after of holding any office or place under the United States.

The second section provides that no other oath shall be required; but nothing in the act is to be construed to relieve any person now laboring under disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution from the penalty or penalties imposed by any law for holding or attempting to exercise the functions of any office contrary to law.

Mr. KASSON. This bill ought to go to a committee. There is too much in it to permit its being properly acted on in this way.

Mr. MOREY. I call the previous question.

The previous question was not seconded.

Mr. MOREY. I move the reference of the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

DISALLOWED CLAIMS.

Mr. LAWRENCE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That two thousand extra copies of the index and summary of the reports of the commissioners of claims in cases reported adversely to Congress be, and the same are hereby, ordered to be printed for the use of the House and five hundred for the use of the commissioners of claims.

JAPANESE INDEMNITY FUND.

Mr. LAWRENCE also submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be, and are hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of restoring to the government of Japan so much of the fund known as the "Japanese indemnity fund" as may not be necessary to meet those claims for damages and expenses properly chargeable upon that fund, and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Speaker, I have a statement here in reference to the Japanese indemnity fund which I ask be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and it will be ordered accordingly.

The statement is as follows:

DEAR SIR: I have taken the liberty of sending you some documents relating to a fund known as the Japanese indemnity fund, which is now in the custody of the State Department at Washington.

At a time of great political excitement in Japan, this indemnity was exacted from the government of that nation for alleged "damages and expenses" arising out of the forcible obstruction of the Straits of Simonoseki in 1863-'64, by a rebellious vassal of the empire. For this act, which the Japanese government neither aided nor countenanced, and for which it expressed the deepest regret—an act which moreover caused insignificant damage and inconvenience—an indemnity of $3,000,000 was demanded by the governments of Great Britain, France, the Netherlands, and the United States, and such indemnity has been paid. The share of the United States in this fund was $750,000. The actual damages and expenses arising out of the transaction above referred to have all been paid, and amounted to less than $50,000. The unexpended balance has been invested in United States bonds, and now, with its accumulations of interest, amounts to more than one and a quarter million dollars.

Up to the present time Congress has taken no action in regard to the disposal of this fund, and it still remains in the charge of the State Department. The circumstances connected with its exaction, its excessive amount, together with the present liberal and progressive attitude of Japan, have given rise to much discussion, and have justified Congress in hesitating to appropriate this money to our own uses. In 1872, when one-half of this indemnity was still unpaid, a bill was unanimously passed by the House of Representatives, authorizing the President to release the government of Japan from further payments. This bill was not reached in the Senate, and thus failed to become a law. As indicated by the debates on this subject in the House of Representatives, by the discussions in the press, and by the memorials addressed to Congress, the sentiment of the nation plainly demands the restoration to Japan of that part of this indemnity not actually required to pay just claims for damages and expenses. Our sense of national justice and magnanimity resents the thought of enriching our Treasury by taking from the scanty resources of Japan the means she so much requires for the education and development of her people. Since the opening of the ports of Japan by Commodore Perry's treaty, she has entered upon a career of self-development which is unprecedented in the history of nations. We have always professed the deepest interest in her national welfare, and a desire to render her substantial aid. It must seem a bitter commentary on such professions of good-will that we are ready to take advantage of a technical offense to exact from her the very means by which her progress can be secured.

My residence of almost three years in that empire, and my participation in the work of establishing a national system of education for the Japanese, enable me to testify to the genuine earnestness with which their career of progress is pursued. I have the most satisfactory grounds for knowing that in the event of the return of this fund it will be devoted exclusively to the promotion of education. While on our own behalf, therefore, we are performing an act of justice, we will at the same time be doing most to secure the permanent well-being of Japan.

From the geographical positions of the two countries, the industrial development of Japan is of the greatest importance to the commercial interests of the United States; it is, therefore, the part of a wise statesmanship to offer not moral encouragement only, but also, as we can in this instance, the material aid so essential at this crisis to the continued progress of Japan.

I earnestly request that you will give attentive consideration to this subject, and in furtherance of the best interests of the two countries that you will render your assistance in securing a restoration of this fund, with all its accumulations. It is hoped that the prompt attention of Congress may be gained, and to this end I trust that you will, through the press and in other public and private ways, aid in awakening public interest.

I shall be pleased to furnish any further information, and will also be obliged to you for suggestions in reference to the promotion of this object. For this purpose my address will be at this place or at Philadelphia, in care of the Japanese commission to the centennial exhibition.

Very respectfully,

DAVID MURRAY.

NEW BRUNSWICK, NEW JERSEY, December 1, 1875.

FINANCIAL POLICY.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I also submit the following resolution, on which I demand the previous question.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of this House that the policy of finance should be steadily pursued which without unnecessary shock to business will ultimately equalize the purchasing power of the gold and paper dollar.

Mr. LAWRENCE. That embodies in substance the words of the Ohio republican platform.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust there will be no objection to referring this to the Committee on Banking and Currency when appointed.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I would rather have it acted on now.

Mr. HOLMAN. I prefer to have it go to a committee.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio consent to its reference?

Mr. LAWRENCE. I do not object.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES FROM STATE TO UNITED STATES COURTS.

SUBSIDIES, ETC.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit the following resolution and on it demand the previous question:

Resolved, That in the judgment of this House, in the present condition of the financial affairs of the Government, no subsidies in money, bonds, public lands, indorsements, or by pledge of the public credit, should be granted by Congress to associations or corporations engaged or proposing to engage in public or private enterprises; and that all appropriations from the public Treasury ought to be limited at this time to such amounts only as shall be imperatively demanded by the public service.

The previous question was seconded; ayes 138, noes not counted.

The main question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The main question having been ordered, the question is, Will the House adopt the resolution?

Mr. HUBBELL. I ask that the resolution may be again read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. HOAR. I should like the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to inform the House whether he intends to cut off the appropriation for the Centennial?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not suppose that that is covered by the word "subsidies," although I should be willing to have it so construed.

Mr. RANDALL. There is a saving clause in favor of the Centennial.

Mr. BEEBE. I call for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 223, nays 33, not voting 33; as follows:

PRESIDENTIAL TERM.

Mr. SPRINGER. I offer the following resolution, upon which I move the previous question:

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, the precedent established by Washington and other Presidents of the United States, in retiring from the presidential office after their second term, has become, by universal concurrence, a part of our republican system of government, and that any departure from this time-honored custom would be unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions.

The question was put upon seconding the previous question; and on a division there were—ayes 144, noes 2.

So the previous question was seconded. The main question was then ordered to be put, being upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. CLYMER. Upon the question of the adoption of the resolution I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MACDOUGALL moved that the House do now adjourn.

Before the reading of the roll-call,

Mr. BEEBE called for the reading of Rule 31.

The rule was read as follows:

Every member who shall be in the House when the question is put shall give his vote, unless the House shall excuse him. All motions to excuse a member from voting shall be made before the House divides or before the call of the yeas and nays is commenced; and the question shall then be taken without debate.

Mr. BEEBE. It was my purpose to insist upon the enforcement of the rule just read. I will not do so, however, for the reason that I think we have had a sufficient declaration of the sentiments of this House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. COX.) Debate is not in order. There is no way of enforcing that rule, as was sufficiently tested at the last session of Congress.

Mr. HOAR. I ask that the reading of the names on the roll be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That requires unanimous consent.

Objection was made, and the roll-call was read, as above recorded.

Accordingly the resolution was adopted.

ADJOURNMENT FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to submit a concurrent resolution for the action of the House at this time.

Mr. CONGER. Has the call of the States been concluded?

Mr. RANDALL. This resolution, under the rule, is always in order.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring therein,) That when the two Houses adjourn on Monday next they stand adjourned until twelve o'clock on Tuesday, January 4, 1876.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to state that this resolution is offered after conference with gentlemen on both sides of the House. I will modify it, however, by saying Tuesday instead of Monday next, as I find it will cut off the amnesty bill that has been assigned for that day.

Mr. BLAINE. I hope the gentleman will not modify it in that respect.

Mr. RANDALL. Why not?

Mr. BLAINE. The resolution in the form the gentleman has offered it has been concurred in; and, besides, I should prefer that the amnesty bill be considered by a full House.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not want to do anything which the other side of the House seem to think may oppress them or interfere with their convenience. I will adhere to the resolution in the form I have offered it.

The resolution was then adopted.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The motion will be entered.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman be kind enough to give us due notice when he intends to call up this motion for discussion?

Mr. BLAINE. Not until a considerable period after the holidays.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CLYMER. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. BLAINE. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement.

Mr. MILLS. I hope the call of States for the introduction of bills, &c., will be concluded before we adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that when the House next meets this call will be resumed, beginning with the State of Arkansas, the call of the State of Missouri having just been concluded; so that it is very fair to assume that before the holidays every member will have ample opportunity to introduce such bills as he may desire.

SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. HALE. I wish to make a privileged motion. I give notice I will move to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution introduced by me this morning was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The SPEAKER. Do you enter the motion to reconsider now, or only give notice of it?

Mr. HALE. I enter the motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The motion will be entertained.

RECIPROCITY.

Mr. CLYMER. I will yield now to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WARD. I desire, not being present when the State of New York was called this morning, to introduce a joint resolution for reference to the Committee on Commerce.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. WARD introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 14) to authorize the appointment of commissioners to ascertain on what terms a mutual beneficial treaty of commerce between the people of the United States and the Dominion of Canada can be negotiated; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution, which was read, authorizes the President of the United States to appoint three commissioners, by and with the advice of the Senate, to confer with other commissioners duly authorized by the government of Great Britain, or whenever it shall appear to be the wish of that government to appoint such commissioners, to investigate and ascertain on what basis a treaty of reciprocal trade, for the mutual benefit of the people of the United States and the Dominion of Canada, can be negotiated.

Mr. WARD. I move the resolution be referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

FREEDMEN'S AFFAIRS.

Mr. CLYMER. I insist on my motion to adjourn.

Mr. BLAINE. I hope the gentleman will yield to me for one moment, as I desire to make a brief statement.

Mr. CLYMER. I will yield to the gentleman for the purpose of explanation.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAINEY] this morning offered a resolution that in making up the committees of the House the Committee on Freedmen's Affairs, which has existed for some years as a standing committee, be omitted. The request was made in the last Congress, but not until after the committees had been appointed. The gentleman, on behalf of those whom he more especially represents, feels, as circumstances have entirely changed since that committee was called for and organized, that it is a needless reflection, if you please, upon the class to whom it refers; that there is no longer any distinction between American citizens; that we are all equal before the law; and that all legislation respecting the rights of any person should go through the ordinary standing committees. If the resolution be of any value, it must be passed before the honorable Speaker shall have announced his committees. It is, therefore, on his behalf that, instead of having the resolution rest in the Committee of the Rules, I was about to ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Freedmen's Affairs be struck from the list of standing committees.

Mr. RANDALL. I will say to the gentleman from Maine that, when the gentleman from South Carolina submitted his proposition, under the rules it had to go to the Committee on the Rules.

Mr. BLAINE. It requires unanimous consent, of course.

Mr. RANDALL. I merely make the statement to show there was no intention to cut off the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. BLAINE. I perfectly understood that.

Mr. COX. There is no objection to it.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Maine?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

R. C. SAWYER.

Mr. CLYMER. I now insist upon my motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires on the part of members to submit several requests to the House before the question is taken on the motion to adjourn.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNING] asks leave to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of R. C. Sawyer, administrator of John Akin, deceased.

Mr. CONGER. I make no objection, but only ask the usual statement shall accompany the withdrawal, that there has been no adverse report in the case.

The SPEAKER. It will be understood in all these cases that the withdrawal is under the rules of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I also ask that copies of the papers be left on file in the Clerk's office.

There was no objection; and leave was granted for the withdrawal of the papers.

The SPEAKER. Several requests have been addressed to the Chair for leave to withdraw papers from the files of the House and refer them to committees. It is unnecessary to consume the time of the House by making these requests, because they can all be granted under the rules by application to the proper subordinate officers of the House. The Chair therefore must decline to present such requests.

FORT HARKER MILITARY RESERVATION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to the Fort Harker military reservation; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CONTINGENT FUND OF POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, transmitting, in compliance with the act of June 8, 1872, a statement of the expenditures made from the contingent fund of his Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

And then, on motion of Mr. CLYMER, (at three o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 16, 1875.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

Mr. STEPHEN W. DORSEY, a Senator from the State of Arkansas, appeared in his seat to-day.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of Jackson Stricker and 37 other citizens of Deedsville, Indiana, praying that the law increasing the postage on merchandise be repealed, and a law enacted authorizing the transmission of merchandise in packages of four pounds or less through the mails at a postage of one-half cent an ounce; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented the petition of the Central Baptist church and congregation of Brooklyn, New York, signed by the pastor and other officers and by a large number of members, asking for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the petition of the First Baptist church and congregation of Cincinnati, Ohio, signed by the pastor and officers, asking for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the petition of the Methodist Episcopal church of West Farms, New York, signed by the pastor and officers, asking for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WALLACE presented the petition of W. W. McKinney and other citizens of Finleyville, Pennsylvania, asking for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HARVEY presented the petition of a number of citizens of Kansas, praying for the repeal of the law imposing the two-cent United States check-stamp tax on bank-checks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KERNAN presented the petition of the Reformed church of West Farms, New York, signed by the pastor and officers, asking for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. OGLESBY. I present a petition of settlers on lands in the State of Kansas embraced in the Kansas Indian reservation, praying that said lands be reappraised. The impression of the petitioners in sending the petition to me was that the matter properly belonged to the Committee on Public Lands, and a letter of the governor also accompanied the petition upon that supposition. I presume the proper reference would be to the Committee on Indian Affairs. I move that the petition take that direction, as it relates specially to an Indian reservation.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. OGLESBY also presented the petition of the Grand Division of Sons of Temperance of the State of Illinois, signed by the officers, asking for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented the petition of the Park Presbyterian church of Newark, New Jersey, signed by the pastor and officers; the petition of the Grand Division of Sons of Temperance of New Jersey, signed by the officers; and the petition of the First Presbyterian church of Elmira, New York, signed by the pastor and the officers of the church, asking for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CLAYTON presented the petition of the heirs of the late William K. Sebastian, formerly a Senator from Arkansas, praying that the resolution of expulsion of that Senator be rescinded and that his rights be restored; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. CONKLING. I present a petition signed by a large number of practical steamboat men and navigators, designating certain amendments in the steamboat laws which they think should be made. I beg leave to say that I take great pleasure in presenting this petition for two reasons; first, because it indicates with somewhat of particularity the changes sought in the steamboat laws, and second because it seems to come from those who have some regard for the safety and security of the men who navigate steamboats and the passengers who travel upon them. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING presented the petition of Samuel Pierce, Daniel Mapes, and other citizens of West Farms, New York, asking for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HAMLIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 115) to provide for the payment of expenses of district judges in certain cases; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate a moment while I explain the provisions of this bill.

The Senate is aware that the salaries of our various district judges are regulated by law. Those various salaries were fixed upon a very careful examination by Congress, and it was designed that they should be somewhat relative to the duties they performed. Hence the different grades of salary. The law regulating the judicial system provides also that for various causes and reasons a district judge of one district may be designated to do duty in another. In some cases, if I am right in my recollection of the law, and I believe I am, it is provided that the expenses of a district judge when doing duty in a district other than his own shall be paid to him; but it is not a uniform rule. This bill provides that, in all cases where a district judge shall be designated to do the duties of a district judge in another district, in addition to his salary he shall have his expenses refunded.

I make these suggestions for the purpose of inviting the Judiciary Committee to the consideration of the subject. I think they have had the matter before them; indeed, I know they have, though I think they have never come to any conclusion upon it. It seems to me to be a case of eminent justice. I commend the bill to their careful consideration, and I know it will receive it. I move that it be printed and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 116) to restore the name of Captain Edward S. Meyer to the active list of the Army from the retired list; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WITHERS (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 117) to aid the Washington, Cincinnati and Saint Louis Railroad Company to construct a narrow-gauge railway from tide-water to the cities of Saint Louis and Chicago; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McDONALD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 118) granting a pension to James H. Woodward; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 119) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to sell at public auction lands no longer required for military purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 120) to authorize the appointment of special agents to investigate frauds under the pension laws of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 121) granting a pension to John Pierson; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAYTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 122) donating the military reservation of Fort Smith, Arkansas, to the city of Fort Smith for free schools; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CRAGIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 123) for the relief of Philip S. Wales, medical inspector in the United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOWE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 124) to provide for a commission on the subject of the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 125) to incorporate the Mutual Protection Fire Insurance Company of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BURNSIDE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 126) to restore appointments and promotions to the Pay Department of the Army; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROBERTSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 127) for the relief of John F. Porteus, of the State of South Carolina; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 128) granting a pension to Frederick Vogel; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ANTHONY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 129) for the relief of the heirs of Asbury Dickins; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I wish to make a statement with regard to this bill, which has had a very unfortunate history. The bill was passed in the House of Representatives and sent here, I think, at the first session of the last Congress. Here it passed after a long debate, and upon the yeas and nays. It was then held up on a motion to reconsider, and was held over the first session and into the second session of the Congress, and was finally taken up and passed on the very last day of the session; passed after a struggle of which everybody was notified and in which many Senators took part. It was then sent to the House to be enrolled, but it was so late that the enrollment did not reach the Senate in time to be signed by the Vice-President.

It seems to me that, as the bill was lost merely by an accident, the Senators who felt it their duty to oppose it (and I am sure that no one opposed it unless he felt it to be his duty, because the sympathy of everybody was for the destitute heirs of this venerable and faithful servant of the Senate for so many years) would do a graceful act, and nothing more than would be just, if they would allow it to take the same course which it would have taken but for that accident and put it on its passage now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It would have been vetoed, or ought to have been.

Mr. ANTHONY. It can be vetoed now. We do not propose to pass it over the President's veto.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest that probably it will not be vetoed until it is passed.

Mr. ANTHONY. It has passed once; it has passed twice; and I should like to try it now. If the Senator objects, we shall try it by and by.

Mr. WRIGHT. That bill was reported from the Committee on Claims. A majority of the committee reported against the bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. But a majority of the Senate voted for it.

Mr. WRIGHT. I remember that very well. I trust the Senator will not insist on the bill being put on its passage now. It should take the usual course and go to the committee.

Mr. ANTHONY. I cannot insist against two such objectors; I would if I could. I move that the bill be printed and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANSOM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 3) authorizing the acceptance by G. Harris Heap, consul of the United States at Tunis, of the trust of commissioner of the Bey of Tunis at the international exhibition of 1876 at Philadelphia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 78) to extend the duration of the court of commissioners of Alabama claims.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 223) to relieve D. B. Conrad, of Virginia, of all political disabilities;

A bill (H. R. No. 217) donating condemned cannon and cannon-balls to the Ladies' Monumental Association of Allegheny County, Pennsylvania, for monumental purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 198) to remove the political disabilities of Robert Tansill, of Virginia; and

A bill (H. R. No. 194) to remove the political disabilities of Samuel Cooper, jr., of Virginia.

The message further announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution, providing that when the two Houses adjourn on Monday next they stand adjourned until twelve o'clock on Tuesday, January 4, 1876.

SENATOR FROM ALABAMA.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, at the last session of the Legislature of the State of Alabama a resolution of that body was passed raising a committee charged to inquire whether corrupt practices had entered into my election by a previous Legislature as a Senator in Congress. A committee was appointed, constituted of political antagonists save one member, and he was well known to be inimical to me. Since the adjournment of the Legislative Assembly, this committee has, as I learn, held sessions from time to time and has taken testimony. The Legislature taking this action was not the one by which I was elected, but was subsequently chosen; and for this and other reasons, implying no disrespect to the Legislature or to the committee, I have not appeared in any way, in person or by counsel. Hence the testimony so far taken is entirely ex parte.

The Senate of the United States being the body empowered to pass on my right to a seat here, I feel warranted in asking of it a full scrutiny of my election and my conduct, contenting myself now with denying the charge that my election was fraudulent or impure.

I will offer a resolution of inquiry presently, but first beg to say one word touching a cognate inquiry, which may, I trust, be made.

Mr. President, the election in the State of Alabama by which the Legislature referred to claims to have been chosen was the result of fraud, open and flagrant, perhaps equaled by the recent election in Mississippi. Like the late Mississippi election, it was but a constituent part of a conspiracy, existing then and now, aimed at the overthrow of republican majorities in the Southern States, whether by fair means or foul.

This conspiracy, in furtherance of its purpose, follows me with charges of corrupt practices. I sincerely hope the committee will find occasion to probe the doings whereby the election in Alabama was carried last year.

I now offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections are hereby instructed to investigate into and inquire whether GEORGE E. SPENCER, a Senator in Congress from the State of Alabama, did use or cause to be used and employed corrupt means or corrupt practices to secure his election to the seat he now holds; and that said committee be empowered to administer oaths, to send for persons and papers, to take testimony, and employ stenographers and such clerical assistants as they may deem necessary, and to sit during the recess of Congress if considered advisable, and to report the result of their investigations as soon as practicable.

Mr. DAVIS. I think that resolution had better lie over until to-morrow and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia objects to its consideration, and the resolution will lie over.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I appeal to the Senator from West Virginia not to make objection. If a Senator has been assailed or aspersed and asks an investigation by a committee, a standing committee of which he is not a member, I think my honorable friend from West Virginia would hardly ask to postpone it even for a day. Surely when a Senator asks that he may be cleansed of an accusation, or convicted if he be guilty, it is so much a question for him, and so little in that respect a question for the other members of the Senate, that I think my friend from West Virginia will not insist upon its lying over.

Mr. DAVIS. I heard only a part of the resolution and I did not catch exactly what it was; but after the explanation of the Senator from New York I withdraw my request that the resolution lie over.

Mr. THURMAN. I know nothing whatsoever of this case. I have not seen the report of the committee of the Legislature of Alabama spoken of, nor any of the testimony taken; but it struck me, on hearing the resolution read, that it is probably not drawn as broad as the mover would wish, if the matter were called to his attention. The resolution, as drawn, if I heard it correctly, limits the inquiry to the question whether the Senator himself was guilty of any corrupt practices in procuring his election.

Mr. SPENCER. Or "caused to be used."

Mr. THURMAN. As I understood it, that is the same thing. The broader question, whether the election was procured by fraud and corruption, is not covered by the resolution. I do not know whether the Senator proposes to limit the inquiry to his own personal conduct, or whether he proposes to have his election fully and thoroughly investigated, whoever may have been corrupt and whoever may have been guilty of fraudulent practices, if any such things took place, upon which I express no opinion at all.

Mr. SPENCER. I have no objection to the Senator from Ohio amending the resolution as he suggests.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not wish to take any part in this business. I only make the suggestion for the Senator himself to consider whether he had not better modify it, if that meets his view, to extend the inquiry to the question whether that election was the result of any fraud or not.

Mr. SPENCER. I will modify the resolution in any words or in any manner that the Senator from Ohio may suggest, and shall be very happy to do so.

Mr. THURMAN. The Clerk can make the change.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will modify the resolution accordingly, and will read it as modified.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution as modified, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be hereby instructed to investigate into and inquire whether, in the election of GEORGE E. SPENCER as a Senator in Congress from the State of Alabama, there were used and employed corrupt means or corrupt practices to secure his election to the seat he now holds; and that the said committee be empowered to administer oaths, to send for persons and papers, to take testimony, to employ stenographers and such clerical assistants as they may deem necessary, and to sit during the recess of Congress if considered advisable, and to report the result of their investigations as soon as possible.

The resolution was agreed to.

DEATH OF SENATOR JOHNSON, OF TENNESSEE.

Mr. COOPER. I gave notice yesterday, sir, that during the next week I would ask the consideration of the Senate to certain resolutions in memory of my late colleague, now deceased; but I see from a message from the House of Representatives that they have agreed to adjourn on Monday. While I desire to bring that matter at as early a day as practicable before the Senate, yet, not to embarrass the Senate in voting on the resolution which has reached us from the House, I ask leave to withdraw that notice; and I now give notice that I will move those resolutions on Tuesday, the 11th of January.

ADJOURNMENT FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring therein,) That when the two Houses adjourn on Monday next they stand adjourned until twelve o'clock on Tuesday, January 4, 1876.

Mr. THURMAN. I have been requested by some members of the other House to say that the railroad facilities will not enable them to get here by the usual hour of meeting on Tuesday, because there are no trains leaving their places of residence on Sunday, and to move an amendment to the resolution to make the adjournment to Wednesday, January 5, instead of Tuesday, January 4. To gratify them I make that motion. It does not concern me at all; I can be here readily enough on Tuesday; but there are some gentlemen from whose places of residence there are no Sunday trains, and they desire that the time of reassembling should be changed to Wednesday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, to strike out "Tuesday, January 4," and insert "Wednesday, January 5."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was concurred in.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills of the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

A bill (H. R. No. 223) to relieve D. B. Conrad, of Virginia, of all political disabilities;

A bill (H. R. No. 198) to relieve the disabilities of Robert Tansill, of Virginia; and

A bill (H. R. No. 194) to remove the political disabilities of Samuel Cooper, jr., of Virginia.

The bill (H. R. No. 217) donating condemned cannon and cannon-balls to the Ladies' Monumental Association of Allegheny County, Pennsylvania, for monumental purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. WALLACE. I ask the courtesy of the Senate to take up this bill and pass it at once by unanimous consent. It is to donate some condemned cannon and cannon-balls to a monumental association for the erection of a monument over certain Federal dead. I suppose there will be no objection to taking it up at this time.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I hope that bill will be referred. My impression is that we have carried this policy of giving away the bronze that is necessary to remanufacture into new cannon quite far enough, and of course there are very few, if any, cannon that are now covered by the description as "condemned" in this proposed bill. At all events, whether covered or not, it involves a vast expense to the Government of the United States to contribute the amount of bronze cannon that is annually called for, worth perhaps forty or fifty cents per pound, and it seems to me that it is time for us to begin to husband our resources. A large proportion of the cannon that we have now is not of the latest manufacture, and it will be necessary that we should incorporate all the improvements which have been made in those that we make hereafter, and this indiscriminate giving away of the raw material which is necessary to make these cannon, it appears to me, is the very worst kind of policy. If it were proposed to give in dollars and cents to any of these associations, I should not object; but I do object to giving away all of the raw material we have, and which may be indispensable to the best interests of the Government itself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont objects, and the bill will go over under the rule.

MILITARY ARRESTS IN ALASKA.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask for the adoption of the following resolution calling for information:

Resolved, That the President be requested to furnish the Senate, if not incompatible with the public service, with a statement of the number of military arrests made in the Territory of Alaska during the past five years, together with the date of each, the charge on which made in each case, the names of the persons arrested, and the period and character of the imprisonment of each in that Territory before trial or surrender to the civil authorities for trial.

Mr. BOUTWELL. That resolution had better go over until to-morrow.

Mr. DAVIS. And let it be printed.

The resolution was ordered to be printed.

MISSISSIPPI ELECTION.

Mr. MORTON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution for the appointment of a committee to investigate the late election in Mississippi.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. MORTON yesterday:

Whereas it is alleged that the late election in Mississippi for members of Congress, State officers, and members of the Legislature was characterized by great frauds, violence, and intimidation, whereby the freedom of the ballot was in a great measure destroyed, a reign of terror established, ballot-boxes stuffed, spurious tickets imposed upon voters, so that a popular majority of more than 25,000 was overcome, and in its place was given an apparent but fraudulent majority of more than 25,000; and whereas the Legislature thus chosen will have the election of a Senator to represent that State in this body; and whereas if these allegations are true a great number of the citizens of the United States have had their rights under the Constitution and laws of the United States wickedly violated: Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators be appointed by the Chair to investigate the truth of the said allegations and the circumstances attending said election, with power to visit said State to make their investigations, to send for persons and papers, and to use all necessary process in the performance of their duties, and to make report to the Senate before the end of this session of their investigation and findings.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I shall make a very brief statement of the reasons for offering this resolution. I have in my possession a large number of documents, affidavits, letters, and statements made by persons living in Mississippi, some of an official character, stating the circumstances attending the recent election.

The brief statement that I shall give of the character of this election of course is not from my own knowledge, and I do not vouch for the truth of these allegations any further than to say that they have been made to me by people some of whom I know to be respectable in their character, and that I am assured the outline I shall make can be proved if a committee shall be appointed by Congress.

The first fact to which I shall call the attention of the Senate is in reference to the total vote in Mississippi at the late election and the total vote in 1869, 1872, and 1873. The total vote of Mississippi in 1869 was 114,283. That was at the time of the adoption of the constitution. The total vote in 1872 in the presidential election was 125,463. The total vote in 1873, the previous congressional election to this, was 117,948. At the last election the total vote was 163,565, being an increase of 38,000 over the highest vote that had been given before. The republican majority in the State in 1869, on the adoption of the constitution, was 38,089 votes. In 1872, at the presidential election, it was 34,887 votes. In 1873 it was 22,976 votes. At the recent election the democratic majority was 30,147 votes.

The total democratic vote in 1869 was 38,097 votes. In 1872 it was 47,286 votes. In 1873 it was 47,488 votes, being 202 votes more than it was in 1872. In 1875, at the last election, it was 96,806. It is alleged on the part of those who have made these statements that this vote is in large part spurious and fraudulent. The enormous increase of itself gives rise to great suspicion, especially when it is considered that the republican vote, though it fell off somewhat, did not fall off in any corresponding ratio.

I have an outline statement of the facts attending the recent election in Mississippi, made out by a prominent gentleman of that State of highly respectable character, occupying an official position; and I am assured that this statement will be sustained by the evidence if an investigation is ordered, and that the proof will probably be stronger than the statement. I give this on the authority of others; I am not now testifying myself at all.

First. As to the manner in which the canvass was conducted.

In a large number of the counties in the State, particularly in the eastern and central parts, the democrats purchased cannon. These were fired often early in the morning and in the evening. Frequently they were carried through the country to places of appointment for public meetings and speaking and fired there and on the way, passing by plantations and along the public roads. This was especially the case in Monroe, Chickasaw, Colfax, and Lowndes Counties, in the east; in Hinds, Rankin, and other counties, in the central part of the State; in Amite, Claiborne, and other sections of the southwestern portion, in all of which there is a large population of colored men and heavy republican majorities. In some of the counties in East Mississippi the boom of the cannon could be distinctly heard in as many as three counties adjoining at the same time. In Hinds County, at Jackson, the capital of the State, Major Allyn, the United States officer commanding the post, loaned the democrats one of the cannon used at the barracks. This was carried in procession through the town and fired, among other places, immediately in front of the governor's mansion, shattering the glass in the building. It was also carried to an adjoining county. This officer, I understand, is now being court-martialed for his conduct.

In some of the counties these cannon were drawn along in processions, on days of public speaking, in charge of men in the usual uniform of an artillery company.

In addition to this, the purchase of Winchester rifles and other guns and pistols of every description, and their exhibition in such way as to make the fact notorious through the country, was another means of inciting terror in the minds of the larger mass of the people. In some parts of the State bodies of men, fully armed, rode through the country in the day-time and at night frequently firing off small-arms.

During the canvass, in three or more counties rows were made at public meetings, at which numbers of colored men were killed. At one place, in Monroe County, a public meeting of republicans was broken up and dispersed by the appearance of a large body of white democrats, fully armed, riding by, and afterward coming into the meeting, though no violence was offered or threatening language used.

In Colfax County such a state of feeling prevailed that late in October, just before the election, three or more of the leading white republicans were so threatened as that one was ordered to leave the county instanter; another, the secretary of the county executive committee of the republican party, was compelled, under threats, to leave his boarding-house; a third, an old man, superintendent of education for the county, and chairman of the republican executive committee of the county, was compelled, by threats of violence, to leave the streets of West Point, and go home, on a day of public meeting. The same was true in other counties.

In some parts of the State, especially in Monroe County, the democratic papers and public speakers announced publicly that they would not employ or rent land to any man who voted the republican ticket. Such action was also announced by democratic clubs in many places.

I am informed otherwise that that method of influencing and intimidating was extensively employed; and I have at least one democratic newspaper published in Mississippi, issued after the election, in which the members of the party in the county were called upon to make good the pledge they had given not to lease any land or to employ or to recognize in business any man, white or black, who had voted the republican ticket.

It is stated in this outline that in Columbus, Lowndes County, on Monday night, November 1, preceding the election next day, an alarm of fire was made early in the night, and the charge made that the negroes had fired the town. The facts in the case show a conspiracy to fire some dilapidated buildings of little value to give color to such charge as stated. A serious riot was the immediate consequence. Four negroes were killed whose bodies were found next day, several wounded, and a number missing whose whereabouts have not yet been ascertained. Prominent white republicans were threatened in presence of their families, by armed men, the same night. The consequence was that the large mass of the colored voters fled for their lives, and white republicans did not dare to take any part in the election next day. Where there was a usual poll of over a thousand republican voters there were only 17 regular republican tickets voted next day.

There was a large number of armed men from Alabama in the town of Columbus the same night, before the election, who remained next day, said to be one hundred and fifty to two hundred.

In Noxubee, a large republican county, open threats of violence were frequently made during the canvass. Only a few days before the election, Dr. Allgord, a white republican and candidate for sheriff, came near being assassinated in the public streets at noon, during a public meeting, and was only saved by resolute men pulling him into a house. At the same time and place, Richard Gray, colored republican, candidate for county treasurer, while attempting to speak, was shot four times. It was supposed he was killed or would certainly die, but he is now recovering. This was in the presence of a large crowd of people.

Second. Management on election-day.

In several places the cannon were carried near the voting-places, so as to be publicly seen.

Small-arms were fired in hearing distance of places where people were voting in one or more counties.

A very general means used to prevent free voting was for democrats, generally white men, to crowd around the voting-places, make side remarks, curse "niggers" in an audible, though covert way, eye voters with intense expression, and the like.

One instance is vouched for by two of the registrars at the court-house box in Columbus, Lowndes County, where a young white man locked arms with a colored man, formerly a slave of the family, and marched to the ballot-box, the white man having a musket at shoulder-arms. On reaching the box, the young white man brought his musket, with emphasis, to order-arms, presented the colored man a democratic ticket, which he voted.

The instances of like management in the State are simply innumerable.

In the counties bordering on the State of Alabama large numbers of men from that State were present on election day to aid in these means.

Third. The use of false tickets and manipulation of ballot-boxes.

This means of "controlling things" was freely practiced. By shrewd management the democrats, under the State laws, obtained appointments of registrars and officers of election who would carry out their plans. It has been suggested that perhaps they had really a majority of the actual officers of election in the State; that, however, I do not know. I merely take what has been sent to me.

In many places tickets were counterfeited; ballot-boxes were taken in charge by democrats in republican counties; and, when the result was announced, false tickets were made to answer for republican votes. This is patent and indisputable in a large number of counties in the State.

In many counties it has been distinctly developed that ballots were so manipulated in this way as that one man could cast five votes or more, according to the number of small tickets incased in a larger one as an outside wrapper, and shrewdly shaken into the ballot-box by persons trained for the purpose.

The result of this programme was that in several counties more votes were counted than there were ballots cast; and the general returns of the election in the counties, the congressional districts, and the State show such an increase in the popular vote as cannot be accounted for by any rational theory of registered voters or actual immigration since the last State election in 1873.

There is a registration law in the State, whereby all voters are registered by name and certificates given. The statement was publicly made at a meeting of the State republican executive committee that the general-election returns showed that 24,000 more votes had been polled in the State than there were registered voters.

I have now given the outline statement that has been furnished to me. As a single illustration, I want to refer to the county of Yazoo. Other counties approximate it, but this perhaps is the most striking instance. It is said of the city of Columbus, where the republicans usually poll 1,000 votes, that, owing to the means employed, they only polled 17. In the county of Yazoo, one of the strongest republican counties in the State, the vote stood in 1873, two years ago—I have not the vote for 1872 and 1869—2,427 republican and 411 democrat. At the last election it stood 7 republican, 4,044 democrat; and it is said that those seven republicans were compelled to vote the republican ticket to show that republicans could vote!

There are many other things that I might say; but I do not design to enter into any further statement than a mere outline of what I am informed can be proved.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I should like to ask the honorable Senator from Indiana under what clause of the Constitution of the United States does he find authority for the Senate of the United States to make the present inquiry in a case of this kind? [A pause.] Perhaps the honorable Senator did not hear my question addressed to him through the Chair.

Mr. MORTON. I will listen.

Mr. BAYARD. As this is a resolution, so far as I know, without any precedent whatever, I would ask the honorable Senator under what clause of the Constitution of the United States does he find authority for this proposed action?

Mr. MORTON. I do not propose now to go into a constitutional argument upon that question. I can only say that the question has been considered heretofore, and that similar committees have been appointed and investigations have been made. The question as to the character of the Louisiana election, I believe, was investigated with the consent and approval of the Senator from Delaware, and I think the Senator has in times past relied somewhat largely on the report of the majority of the committee made in that case. But if the statements I have made are true, or only partially true, it is very obvious to the Senator from Delaware that the rights of citizens of the United States under the Constitution and laws of the United States have been grossly violated; the enforcement law, as it is called, has, among others, been violated. This has operated largely upon the colored people of Mississippi, and was intended to affect them.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I am not at all surprised that the honorable Senator from Indiana has not given a plain answer to a very plain question, because he has too much respect for his position as a constitutional lawyer to state false law to the Senate on a subject so grave as this. He answers me that I have cited in debates in this body the conclusions of fact found by a committee of the body. Why, the Senator knows that the committee upon affairs of Louisiana was the standing Committee of Privileges and Elections of this body, acting under that clause of the Constitution which makes the Senate the sole judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members; and when the Legislature of Louisiana, or two bodies each claiming to be the lawful Legislature of Louisiana, sent here proofs of their relative action by the election of members, then the Senate, being called upon to exercise its exclusive functions under the Constitution of determining the membership of this body, referred that question to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, of which the honorable Senator was and is chairman, and their report was made in regular accordance with precedent.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. I think the Senator is not quite accurate in regard to the origin of that investigation. If my memory is correct, that investigation was ordered and begun before any senatorial credentials came here. After the credentials came, they were then referred to that committee. I think I am correct in that statement.

Mr. BAYARD. I will not place my memory against that of the honorable Senator on that point, but I will merely state that, so far as my recognition and use of any action of one of the committees of this body has been concerned in argument, it has been action taken in due course of law and the regular proceedings of the Senate. I merely mean to say that the present case has no precedent. If it has, it is unknown to me, and I shall assume that it has none, when the author of it is unable to point out that such a precedent exists.

The honorable Senator has stated, in support of this resolution and in reply to me, that the legal rights of certain citizens of this country have been violated. The enforcement law is one of the acts to which he referred as having been violated. Well, Mr. President, is not this a government of laws? How are violations of the law to be met? Has the law no power, no majesty? Are our courts without jurisdiction and powers of legal enforcement? What is the remedy in any case where a man has sustained loss of rights, either of property, or person, or reputation? Application to the courts of law. The Senator, surely, has not at least been remiss in providing law to meet every supposable case where the United States can be imagined to have power. Our statute-books are filled with such remedies. They bristle with penalties of the very highest and most excessive character against the violators of laws which the Senator and his party associates in the two Houses of Congress have made. Therefore, if there be wrong, there can be no lack of remedy; and if these alleged violations of legal and constitutional rights have occurred, I submit that the courts of the country are open to every one who has been wronged; open for the presentation of indictments against the offenders; open for the recovery of damages for any injury that any party may have sustained. Under a government of laws this is the only proper mode of proceeding; and it is no answer, but on the contrary it is the confession of inability to make reply, when the Senator tells me that there are legal rights of parties in Mississippi which have been violated, and for that reason his resolution should be passed.

Now, sir, there can be no suggestion which can have weight with any man in this country that the political or party friends of the Senator in the State of Mississippi have not at least a full and equal chance of justice before the laws either of the United States or of the State of Mississippi. The State of Mississippi is wholly, has been almost hopelessly, in the hands of that Senator's political associates and friends. There is not in the wide borders of that State, except it may be under this last election, a single official of the political party opposed to that Senator. From the governor down to the constable, all over the State, every judge, every justice, every judicial, every ministerial, every executive officer has been of his political faith; and such men have had the making of the State laws and the execution of those State laws. How is it in regard to the laws of the United States? There is not a man holding any Federal office, judicial or executive, high or low, in the State of Mississippi, who is not thoroughly in accord with the honorable Senator. Therefore, if these wrongs have been committed toward any individual or any class of individuals, there is the amplest remedy fully furnished by the statute-books, both Federal and State, by the representatives of public justice, both Federal and State. The juries are chosen wholly, both in the Federal and State courts, by officials of his own party. The entire control of this question in the State is wholly and solely in the hands of those who sympathize with the political views and action of the honorable Senator; and if there there may not be found a remedy, what a confession either of incompetence or of corruption on the part of those in whose hands he would have again placed power for the purposes of public government?

But, Mr. President, this resolution contains a claim of power which it seems to me should be entirely fatal to its consideration or acceptance by the Senate, when it proposes by anticipation to interfere with the result of a senatorial election in a State. How can this body take cognizance of any fact connected with a State election? How far can it proceed? In one case, and in one case only—in determining the elections, qualifications, and returns of persons who claim seats in this body as members. If there be any other case imaginable, I will thank any gentleman of the opposite party to rise here and state it. There is the sole constitutional ground—the sole pretext; and we know how that question regularly arises. When the Senator whose future election by the Legislature of Mississippi it is contemplated by the Senator from Indiana to interfere with arrives here from Mississippi, when he comes here with his credentials, if there shall be grounds which justify the Senate, sitting as a judicial body, to determine that he is not qualified under the law, that his returns are irregular, or that from any cause he is not entitled under the Constitution to admission here, then we would sit as judges and determine that fact, and take just such testimony as would properly enable us to discharge our duty faithfully. But until that time comes are we by anticipation to do this, no one asserting any proper ground for this unprecedented exercise of power?

But, Mr. President, it does not stop here. When before, in the history of this Government, has the Senate of the United States undertaken to deal in advance, by anticipation, with the examination of testimony in respect to the election and returns of members of the co-ordinate branch of Congress? When, before, did any Senator of the United States propose that we should send out a roving commission into any State to examine, upon the vaguest charges of disorder, into the election of members of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States? Yet that is what the honorable Senator has expressly recited as one of his grounds for urging this resolution. "Each house shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members;" and now we have a proposition that the Senate, acting as a separate body, taking proof which is not cognizable before the other House, shall undertake, in disregard of the laws relating to contested elections in the House, to usurp the functions of the House, and declare in advance that certain testimony shall be used to seat or unseat persons who may be returned as elected members of that body! Why, sir, the statement of this case is enough; argument is certainly superfluous upon it. And the man who will hear the facts stated, and read the proposition, and then vote for it, is beyond any argument that I can adduce or imagine to be possible.

Mr. President, there is another clause of the Constitution which it occurred to me, in thinking over under what imaginable power the Senator was proceeding in this case, might possibly be relied on. It is that which provides that "The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the Legislature, or of the executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence." Is it under any color of authority there, under the suggestion of past domestic violence that has wrought its evil effect, that the Senate is called upon as a separate body now to interfere? Is not such a proposition absurd? Is it not a matter of public cognizance? Is it not a matter of which the Senate will take judicial notice that during the last fall, pending the Mississippi canvass, the governor of that State, alleging that there was proposed intimidation which he thought would be efficient to destroy the freedom of election, did, after his custom, as he himself was officially the creation of military violence, (and that was his sole and his immediate resource in every case of opposition to his will,) send communications to the President of the United States calling for troops to hold that State in awe, or, to use his own words, "to keep the public peace?" The correspondence between the head of the Department of Justice, the present Attorney-General of the United States, and the governor of Mississippi, Mr. Ames, is well known to the Senate and the country. They know that he presented no case which an officer mindful of constitutional obligations was entitled to consider and respond to favorably. On the contrary, he was told that when he showed a condition of facts in which military force could be lent by the General Government to sustain a State and its executive in the absence of the Legislature it would be furnished; and, when the governor failed to respond, he virtually confessed his inability to present such a state of facts, and he did not press his inquiry, nor were troops sent there under his requisition. That has passed away.

I do not care to enter the lists with the honorable Senator from Indiana in bandying assertions. I do not propose ever to raise with him an issue of fact unless there is some means of arbitration between us. It would be an easy thing for me to repeat the statements of men of character, intelligence, and integrity as to the general history of the late election in Mississippi. I could assure him, and assure the Senate and the country, that men as intelligent, as upright, as reliable as any would aver and have averred to me, of their own personal knowledge, that all over that State there was an absence of intimidation, there was a regularity, there was an honest and warm public concurrence in the result which has not been known in that State since the period of reconstruction.

I saw a private letter, written to a gentleman in the North and having large interests in Mississippi, that the result of the election had everywhere advanced the price of property in that country.

But, as I have said, I do not propose to enter into a controversy of mere assertions. I have no right to make a controversy in regard to the affairs of the State of Mississippi when I disclaim and deny entirely the lawful authority of this body to interfere with her local and domestic affairs in the manner proposed by the honorable Senator.

But, sir, there was no subject with which both Houses of Congress more constantly were occupied, none in regard to which the President of the United States took greater personal and official interest, than the condition of the Southern States during the last winter. We heard from him by way of special message; we heard from him by way of applications for new and excessive power over those portions of the country; we members in this body and the other House of Congress had the fullest discussion, the largest and most particular inquiry, into the social and political condition of that portion of the Union known as the South; and yet here is the fact that, well-informed though he must be, perfectly apprised though we know him to be, in his late message, not yet even printed by order of this body or not yet circulated among the members, there is not one word of reference to what may be called the southern question. The Department of Justice, it is commonly understood, has had its agents in the southern country, and in this very State of Mississippi, gathering information for the guidance of that Department, and from that Department comes not one word by way of report or suggestion. If the things recited in this resolution had occurred; if they were of a kind to have merited this extraordinary and active interference by Congress, I submit to the Senate, is it not remarkable that the President of the United States should have maintained dead silence on the subject, and that the officer into whose hands this peculiar question had been committed, and who, as we all know, had his attention so strongly drawn to it, should never have communicated a single word or fact in relation to the subject? It comes from the ever-bubbling spring of knowledge which the Senator from Indiana seems to possess on such subjects, his desire to bring up this question, always having a hostile feeling or intent toward the peace of the Southern States. It comes here before the Senate from him, and from him alone; not an affidavit, not a petition is presented; there is no regularity in the matter; it comes through no legal channel, but is a spontaneous effort on his part to light anew some brand of discord, and arouse some assault of a general, unspecific character, without facts, against a whole people, and embracing in the jurisdiction that he claims powers exclusively belonging to a co-ordinate branch of this Congress, with which we have not and cannot have any right of interference at all. Even had this been a joint resolution; even had it required the co-operation of the other House of Congress, the rights of whose members are proposed here to be inquired of, and the evidence touching whose right to their seats in that body it is proposed by this commission to establish, it would have been irregular, unconstitutional, and unwarranted. But, standing as it does now, what is this resolution? It comes before us from no quarter recognized by law or by the Constitution as even having the right to claim the interposition of Congress for any purpose whatever. As I said before, if there have been infractions of law, the law has power to remedy them, and the officers of the law are delinquents if they do not set that law in force.

No, Mr. President, the country will see, and the Senate may see, that this is a revolutionary proposition. It is but one further step in the march toward consolidation of power, which the people of this country must see, and which, if they know their own safety, they will sternly check and arrest. It is the first time in the history of this country that the Senate of the United States has sought to invade the privileges of the other House of Congress, and to take testimony concerning the proper election of its members. It is not, however, the first time in the history of "reconstruction." We are now witnessing an attempt to carry out a threat of the honorable Senator that four or five years ago was darkly shadowed forth upon this floor. At the time when he and his party friends were seizing these communities at the South by the throat, compelling them in advance to consent to changes in the Constitution of the country which were to affect us all; at a time when they were bound, helpless and bleeding, at the feet of him and his party, we asked, "Is there no time to come when these States shall be rehabilitated and have coequal existence as States within this Union?" He was asked that question, although he gave no decided answer, any more than now he gives when he is asked where is his power as a Senator, obeying a written Constitution, to find warrant for such action as this; and he still sits silent, and is unable to give it.

Suppose these States to have been rehabilitated, suppose "reconstruction" to have been complete, and that they stand forth at last fashioned as your will hath made them, but at least with a confessed autonomy, you still claim the right over them that you shall inquire into their local and domestic affairs, and treat Mississippi, or Louisiana, or Alabama differently from New Jersey or New York. His answer then was and still is that he claimed the right to "deal with the States." Such ambiguous phrase he then used; and to-day we have an illustration of what he meant by "dealing with a State." Now, Senators, see what is the effect of his proposition, which is, that where an election has been conducted in a State, before the question of contest as to membership of this body arises, before a contest in regard to membership of the other body arises, when no application from the governor of the State to the Executive, the Executive being certainly in all respects favorable to his application, has been made to show that there was either duress or such intimidation as paralyzed the will of the people of that State and made their election no free election, and therefore no election at all, we have a claim made that the Congress of the United States, or even one branch of Congress, shall, of its own motion, take up and examine these questions of contested election; because, of course, this application for information would be idle unless it is to be followed by an exercise of power to remedy the wrong that is said to have occurred. The Senator surely would not take up the time or money of the people of this country in an examination that was to be empty and have no fruits. On the contrary, this is to be a preliminary inquiry to an exercise of power to remedy the wrongs which the Senator suggests have occurred. This is the claim of power. Let us contemplate it. Let the people of this country contemplate it. Elections unsatisfactory to the minority are very apt to occur. Changes in public sentiment are very apt to occur. Strong indications of that have been felt in the State which the honorable Senator himself represents in part upon this floor. The presence of his colleague is a proof to him and to us that there was a vast change in the popular sentiment of his State a very short time ago.

Mr. MORTON. And that is very likely to occur in the Senator's State.

Mr. BAYARD. It may occur in the State that I have the honor in part to represent, but God forbid that when my people shall express their opinion against me and my party at the ballot-box I shall come here and ask Congress to revolutionize my State government for the sake of giving me party advantage. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will take occasion to announce to those persons occupying the galleries that if there is applause again he will order the Sergeant-at-Arms to clear them.

Mr. BAYARD. I did not cite the case of the Senator's State with any intent to do so small a matter as to be personally disrespectful to him. I merely did it for the purpose of showing that which every Senator knows is one of the incidents of a popular government, the ebb and flow of popular opinion, the ebb and flow of political power. It is well for us it should be so. So long as that ebb and flow can take place, so long the freedom and liberty of this people will remain; and it is in the attempts to put arbitrary congressional checks upon that ebb and flow that I see great danger. Our hope is, and our safety is, in the instinctive sense of self-preservation of our people and their capacity and power to express it by their votes at the polls. But what is the use of voting, what is the use of this change of opinion, when men have suffered, when communities have suffered, and instinctively have sought to right and relieve themselves, if the veto of Congress shall be put upon the change, and a Senator, simply by alleging that a majority of 25,000 one way has been succeeded by a majority of 25,000 the other way, can induce the Senate of the United States, with no case before it for adjudication, with no one claiming a seat, with no law alleged which binds it in judging as to its membership, to undertake virtually to change it? For I tell you if you do not mean to assume power to act upon the case alleged by way of recital in this resolution, then this inquiry is idle and futile. It must be meant as preliminary to the exercise of power in one way or the other. Otherwise it would be a fruitless and useless inquiry and expense for the Senate to go to. When the Senate shall anticipate that this is the preliminary to action, and will look at it sensibly and justly, then they will see that by giving assent to a proposition of this kind they will have declared that the elections in the States, so far as membership in this body and perhaps in the other House is concerned, are to be judged by the Senate of the United States upon the report of one of its committees, and that committee one of investigation generally into the circumstances attending a popular election throughout a State.

Mr. President, I am sorry that the honorable Senator introduced the resolution. It is so grave and dangerous a question, that I am sorry he did not allow more time to pass before he called it up, or that he has not done us the favor to give some justification for his attempted exercise of power in this case.

There are many other views to be taken of it which in a discussion so hasty and unpremeditated as this I have failed to express. The Senate have often in its consideration of the elections and returns of members said that they would halt upon the threshold of the legislative chambers of the State; that they would not try the title of members of a Legislature. I think I have even heard the honorable Senator from Indiana say as much. It is not important whether I am mistaken as to his view; but such I know has been the accepted opinion of this body, and I am disposed to say that it has been the invariable action of the body to hold that the Legislature of a State is just as exclusively the judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns of the membership of its own bodies as is this Senate of its own membership, and that we may not lawfully interfere with or usurp their just functions; when there has been regularity upon the face of their proceedings we do not try the title of members of the Legislature to their respective seats. Yet this resolution goes much further. This is not only a claim of the right to try the title of members of the Legislature to their seats in the Legislature, but also that broader claim to determine the question of the popular vote, which lies at the basis of popular representation in the choice of members of the other House of Congress. Here is a grave and dangerous question and a long stride in favor of consolidated power, which it seems to me ought to be as full of warning to those who may be soon in the minority, although now in the majority. There is no safety for any of us except in standing by the law; there is no safety for any of us in the heyday of accidental and temporary power in stepping over those bounds which the wisdom of our fathers implanted in the limitations of the written charter of government they confided to our hands and which our solemn oaths should compel us to respect.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware has spoken so forcibly and admirably in opposition to this resolution that I almost feel that an apology is necessary for adding a word to what he has so well said. But there is something more to be said upon it that in my judgment ought to be said. What is this resolution? Let us look at it, and analyze it, and find out, not simply whether there is any constitutional power for the investigation which is proposed, but whether there is any foundation to the investigation even were the constitutional power conceded.

This resolution was introduced by the Senator from Indiana yesterday, and he did not see fit to refer it to any committee. He has moved no reference. He has asked us to take it up to-day for consideration, and we have done so: and so far, not having moved its reference to any committee, the presumption is that he expects it to be put to a vote in the Senate without any such reference, and consequently without any report upon it. Now, let us look at it. It has a preamble:

Whereas it is alleged that the late election in Mississippi for members of Congress, State officers, and members of the Legislature was characterized by great frauds, violence, and intimidation, &c.

"Whereas it is alleged." Alleged by whom? Alleged by the President? No. Alleged by the governor of that State in any official paper? No. Alleged in any petition to Congress? No. Alleged in any petition to the Senate? No. Alleged in any paper that is before us which we can officially consider? No. Alleged how, then? Alleged in affidavits, we are told, whose direction is, whose address is, and whose receptacle is the private pocket of the Senator from Indiana. Are we to act upon allegations of that kind, with no official statement, no petition, no evidence before us, with not one single thing in the shape of evidence, or petition, or message, or official representation? Are we to go into the work of appointing, as has been alleged, a roaming commission over Mississippi to find whether the election there last fall was peaceably and fairly conducted?

It is but a day or two since my friend the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] introduced a resolution to inquire whether certain reports had been made from the Treasury Department to Congress which the plain statutes of Congress required should be made, and he recited in a preamble to his resolution of inquiry of the Secretary of the Treasury that it was asserted that those reports had not been made since March 2, 1865. What did my friends on my right say then? They objected to the passage of that resolution upon a bare assertion, although the Senator from West Virginia stated to the Senate that the officer whose duty it was to make those reports had said to him that he believed no such reports had been made since the 2d of March, 1865. It was objected that it was stated simply in the preamble that "it is asserted that no such reports have been made;" and yet in the case of a plain simple resolution like that, of mere inquiry of one of the heads of Department whether reports required by law from that Department had been made, and if not, why not, the Senate would not act upon that assertion, but required that the resolution should be sent to the Committee on Finance. But now, when it is proposed to interfere with the election of a State and send a roaming commission into a State to traverse it up and down and try and find some political capital, it is to be done simply upon the assertion of men who are nameless, and whose representations find lodgment only in the pockets of the Senator from Indiana! That is the first thing that strikes me about this resolution.

But now upon the question of constitutional power, forsooth, where is it? Is it in the election of the Legislature of the State? Will the Senator from Indiana claim that he has any right to go into that State with his commission to investigate whether the Legislature of that State was lawfully elected or not? Will he claim that he has any right to go into an inquiry whether the members of the House of Representatives in Congress were lawfully elected, and thus usurp a power that belongs exclusively to the House of Representatives? Certainly he will make no such pretense as that. Will he then say that because a Senator may be elected by that Legislature that fact gives us a right to pass this resolution and institute this inquiry? What a proposition is that! That refers the power to that provision in the Constitution which makes us the judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns of Senators; and whoever heard of going into that question before the Senator was elected at all? Does the Senator want to forestall the judgment of the Senate? Does he want, without any party here to such an inquiry, without any election of Senator, much less the presentation of his credentials, to go into an inquiry as to the election in Mississippi which shall forestall the Senate on the 4th of March, 1877, when it comes to decide upon the credentials of the person who shall then present himself here claiming a seat in this body? What right have you to forestall judgment in that case? The Senate then will be constituted differently from what it is now. The men who will have to pass on that question will not be precisely the men who now occupy seats in this Chamber. Some will have left this Chamber, and others will have taken their places. What right have we, forsooth, now to go into any inquiry which will forestall the judgment of that Senate to whom will belong the right to pass upon the credentials of the person who will claim a seat in this body under the election of the Legislature of Mississippi? A judge who would thus forestall judgment and prejudge a case would be impeached in any country in God's world in which the remedy of impeachment exists; and what would be infamous in a judge cannot be justifiable in the Senate of the United States.

The Senator from Indiana was exceedingly unfortunate in referring to the Louisiana investigation to justify this resolution. What was the Louisiana case? In 1872 there was an election in Louisiana. The official returns showed that John McEnery was elected governor and his associates to the heads of the various departments of the State. By an illegal order of Judge Durell and the armed intervention of Federal troops those official returns were utterly disregarded and a flagrant usurpation of that government took place in the person of William Pitt Kellogg. Then there were two persons claiming to be governor of that State. Each of them qualified. Kellogg qualified and McEnery qualified. There were two bodies also claiming to be the Legislature of that State—what was known as the Pinchback or Kellogg legislature, and what was known as the McEnery legislature. That was the state of affairs when Congress assembled in December, 1872. In the mean time, however, the President had recognized the Kellogg government. His recognition, as was admitted on all hands, was only, to use a legal phrase, good de bene esse; it could be overruled by Congress. Called on to act in the vacation of Congress, he was compelled to recognize one or the other as the lawful government of Louisiana, or thought himself compelled to do so; and if the necessity existed for Federal recognition then he was justified in recognizing one or the other. But his recognition was not binding on us; it was not binding on Congress. He, himself, in his message, recognized our right to overrule his decision, and expressed a desire that Congress should recognize the one government or the other, and thus guide his footsteps. The question then was fairly before us; a question that constitutionally belonged to us: Is there a government in Louisiana, and if so, what is that government—Kellogg and his legislature, or McEnery and his legislature? There was no escaping the question. It had to be examined; for this Government must recognize a State government as existing if there is a State government in existence; and where there are two bodies claiming to be the State government, of necessity we are compelled to decide which is the true one. That being the case, what was done? While the McEnery legislature was yet in existence and holding session; while McEnery was claiming to be governor, and was exercising as far as possible the functions of governor; while, on the other hand, Kellogg and his associates and his legislature were performing the like functions, this resolution was introduced:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be instructed to inquire and report to the Senate whether there is a legal State government in Louisiana, and how and by whom it is constituted.

That resolution was adopted on the 16th day of January, 1873, having been introduced some time before that day. It referred the matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. It was a perfectly proper resolution. It was taking jurisdiction of nothing which did not belong to us. We were to inquire whether or not there was a government in the State of Louisiana; and, if we found two ostensible governments there, we were to ascertain which was the true government of that State. We did not go then one step beyond our jurisdiction. But the resolution did not stop there. There was something more referred to that committee at the same time. I read now from the report:

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred Senate resolution of January 16, 1873, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be instructed to inquire and report to the Senate whether there is a legal State government in Louisiana, and how and by whom it is constituted"—

And to which committee were also referred the credentials of John Ray and W. L. McMillen, both claiming the seat supposed to have been made vacant by the resignation of William Pitt Kellogg, a Senator of the United States from the State of Louisiana, respectfully submit the following report.

There that committee had the foundation for its jurisdiction. It was not simply the question whether there was any State government in Louisiana; but they had before them the credentials of two men each claiming the seat that was made vacant by Kellogg's resignation.

Mr. MORTON. The credentials were referred to them after the investigation was ordered.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not care when they were referred. The election took place at the time prescribed by the act of Congress. I think the Senator is entirely mistaken, for the election must have taken place on the second Tuesday of January of that year, and that could not have been later than the eighth day of that year, and this resolution that was sent to that committee did not pass until eight days afterward, the 16th. I think it will be found by reference to the Journals of this body that the credentials of Mr. Ray, who claimed under the Kellogg legislature, and of Mr. McMillen, who claimed under the McEnery legislature, were referred about the same time that this resolution was passed. Certain I am of one thing, and every member of that committee will bear me out in the assertion, that not one particle of testimony was taken by that committee until Ray and McMillen both appeared, and that they with their counsel were in prompt attendance on that committee from the beginning of the taking of the testimony until it was closed. That was no ex parte proceeding. That was no forestalling of judgment. That was no prejudging the case. That was no inquiring two years before a case could arise. That was an inquiry of which this body had complete jurisdiction and in which all the parties interested were duly represented. How different is this proposition! Here is a proposition to go into an investigation of the power in Mississippi to hold an election two years before we shall have to pass upon the right of any Senator who may be elected by the Legislature of that State, two years before any man can present himself here with his credentials as a Senator from that State. That cannot be justified for one moment. It would not do for me to say that here is to be an attempt to get up an electioneering document at the public expense, a repetition of what some people think has taken place in times gone by. It would not do for me certainly to impute that to the honorable Senator from Indiana, and I do not; but when he comes to ask himself what right has the Senate to institute this investigation, what good is to come of it, who is it to affect, he will find it impossible to give himself an answer that will be satisfactory to his own mind.

The Senator suggested that the enforcement law had not been complied with. The answer to that, given by the Senator from Delaware, is conclusive. The sanctions of that law are judicial punishments. The courts in Mississippi are competent to try every offender against that law. It is nowhere asserted in the preamble of this resolution that there is no government in Mississippi, as was alleged in the case of Louisiana. It is nowhere alleged in the preamble of this resolution that the judiciary is disturbed in the exercise of its functions in Mississippi. It could not be truly asserted. There is a State peaceable, now, at least, in which all the departments of government are in the free and undisturbed exercise of their functions, and if there has been a violation of any statute of the United States, the courts are the place in which to enforce that statute by visiting upon the offenders the penalties that it provides.

I must say, Mr. President, that in all the investigations that have been ordered—going very far, I admit, going sometimes beyond what I thought was the constitutional power of this body—I do not recollect any case that is at all parallel to this. The Ku-Klux investigation affords no justification for this. In that case we had petition after petition; in that case we had message after message of governors of Southern States; in that case we had something upon which to act; but here there is nothing of that sort. Here there is nothing whatsoever to lay the foundation for the exercise of any power that belongs to the Senate of the United States, and there is no constitutional power whatever to make this inquiry at this time in the manner which is proposed.

Mr. MORTON. I shall occupy the attention of the Senate for but a very few minutes. In my opinion this debate this morning on the part of our friends on the democratic side of this Chamber is simply extraordinary. It is, in my judgment, in conflict with the whole line of their argument in the Louisiana case. If my memory is not at fault, my distinguished friend from Delaware has argued in the Louisiana case—I may not be right as to him, but I am sure nearly all his friends around him have, and I think he has; he will correct me if I am wrong—that we were not bound to stop at the limits of the State-house; we were not bound by the decisions of State tribunals in regard to elections; we were not bound by the action of the State courts; we were not bound by the action of State tribunals especially authorized to decide all questions of State election, whether in regard to members of the Legislature or in regard to State officers, but that the Senate could go behind all of those decisions, go behind the recognition of the State government, of the Legislature, or of the State executive, by the President, by the House of Representatives, and even by the Senate itself, and inquire whether a member of the State Legislature had been elected, whether Representatives or Senators had been elected or obtained their seats by fraud; and a man has been knocking at the door of this Chamber for nearly three years who holds the twice-repeated credentials of a State Legislature, recognized by every forum of the State tribunals, by the highest and lowest courts of the State, a Legislature that has made innumerable laws now in force, that has been recognized by the President as the Legislature, that has been substantially recognized by the House of Representatives, and these gentlemen have insisted on going behind everything and keeping that man out of doors. It is true there were grave objections to him in their opinion; but it was a question of constitutional right and of legal right to a seat on this floor, and now we are told we cannot even investigate the election.

The preamble recites that at this election members of the other House were chosen, and also members of the State Legislature, and that Legislature is to choose a Senator, and will in the course of a few days, and that rights of citizens of the United States were violated, grossly violated. Why, sir, Congress is required to guarantee to each State a republican form of government. How can we do that unless we know the condition of the State? And we have a right to find out in repard to the condition of the State. Besides, the fourteenth amendment provides that no State shall deprive a citizen of the equal protection of the laws, and we have adopted laws to carry that out; and the fifteenth amendment guarantees the right of suffrage to colored men upon the same conditions that white men enjoy it, and we have enacted a law to carry that out. And yet we now have no right to appoint a committee to investigate! I say that these arguments are in hostility to the whole line of argument which my friends have made on the Louisiana case. They have this morning, in my judgment, substantially taken back all they have said in regard to that.

In the case of Louisiana, the committee to investigate the Louisiana election was instructed to investigate that election, I think, on the 16th of January, 1873, and the credentials of the Senators were referred to that committee, as the memorandum which has been made out by the Clerk shows, first, on the 22d of January, 1873, a week after the appointment of the committee—I know it was after the investigation began—and again on the 7th of March. The investigation was ordered without reference to the credentials of Senators, as I distinctly recollect and as the record shows.

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Senator pardon me if I ask him just here, if that was the case, how comes it that the report of the committee concludes with three resolutions, of which the first is that there is no State government at present existing in Louisiana, and the second that neither John Ray nor William L. McMillen is entitled to a seat in the Senate, neither having been elected by the Legislature of the State of Louisiana?

Mr. MORTON. My friend is entirely right. That investigation lasted until nearly the end of the session, until after the credentials had been submitted, and when the committee made their report they covered the whole ground. But the point I make is that the investigation was ordered before the credentials had been submitted with the approbation of my friend from Delaware and the Senator from Ohio likewise. Now it has been discovered in the case of Mississippi that there is no power to investigate. It is a very recent discovery, Mr. President.

The Senator from Ohio used a remarkable argument. He said that in the case of the Ku-Klux investigation, where elections were investigated very fully, where the question was investigated whether the fourteenth amendment had been complied with or had been violated——

Mr. THURMAN. In elections?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir; it embraced elections as well as conduct outside of elections. My friend from Ohio says that in that case there were petitions for it, and there were messages of governors of States invoking an investigation, just as if our right here to order an investigation depends on a petition sent in or depends upon the message of the governor of a State. Why, this is truly a new idea. It is sometimes said that there is nothing new, but really there are new things, and this is one of them, that our right to investigate depends on petitions that may be sent here or on the messages of governors of States.

Mr. President, this is a very grave matter. If it is true, as alleged in the preamble of this resolution, that the people of Mississippi have been stricken down by the means that are referred to, that a majority of twenty-five thousand, no difference whether it is republican or democratic, has been stricken down by these fraudulent and violent means, and another set up in its place of twenty-five or thirty thousand, that is a very important matter. It affects this whole Commonwealth; it affects the rights of the people. If elections can be carried, if presidential elections, if elections of Senators of the United States, if the governments of States can thus be seized and controlled by violence, by fraud, by the most enormous, as I am advised and believe—by the most enormous and successful system of ballot-box stuffing ever practiced in the United States—if that thing can be done and we cannot afford to investigate, and have no power to investigate, although we are bound to secure to all men the equal protection of the laws, although we are bound to guarantee republican forms of government, to what a sad extremity are we reduced? I say, sir, that the power to order this investigation is in several clauses of the Constitution.

It is said by the Senator from Delaware that Ames demanded aid from the Government, and the Government refused it. True. My friend from Ohio asks where is there a petition demanding this investigation; where is the evidence? Well, sir, the air has been pretty full of it. Has the Senator forgotten the massacre at Clinton, in Mississippi, I think in September, upon which occasion the aid was demanded by the governor of Mississippi? A republican meeting was held, a conflict took place, three white men were killed and four negroes; and then the hunt began; and, according to the statement which I have seen, and I believe it has never been contradicted, before that hunt was over from sixty to seventy colored men were killed. But when the governor of that State demanded aid the perpetrators of that crime had dispersed—all was peace; and telegrams came from Mississippi "All is quiet; no ground for the interference of the Government." The dead were not making any fuss about it, and those who had performed the deed had gone to their homes; all was quiet! We get news of a massacre, but before we get the news the assassins have dispersed, and all is peace and quiet again; there are no threats of overturning the government, and there is no ground of interference!

My friend from Delaware says that this is a revolutionary proposition. No, Mr. President, it is not revolutionary; it is a guard against revolutions. The revolution comes in when it is made possible for twenty-five or thirty thousand people in the majority to be beaten down and overwhelmed by fraud, by violence, and intimidation. There is where the revolution comes in.

The Senator from Delaware says that if the republicans should carry his State he would not come here for relief. Well, Mr. President, if the republicans should carry his State by the means by which it is alleged that the State of Mississippi has been carried by the democratic party, I am sure we should never hear the end of it in this country. We should hear of it here; we should hear of it in their press; we should hear of it in every form and by every channel that is open.

The Senator says that this is an effort to light anew the fires of discord. Certainly; let these outrages be practiced, these great wrongs be done; and then, if you make any fuss about it and say a word about it, "you are trying to light the fires of discord; you had better silently submit; let it be practiced next year in South Carolina; let it be practiced next year again in Louisiana or any other State where it is necessary, and do not say anything about it, because you are lighting anew the fires of discord!" The best way to preserve the peace is to avoid the practices which are charged to have taken place in the State of Mississippi; not by keeping silence and not by submitting in silence to these great wrongs. This is very bad advice. When monster wrongs of this kind, revolutionizing a State government and threatening our institutions themselves, are committed, you must not say anything about them, because if you do you are making up an electioneering document or you are lighting anew the fires of discord; submit to these great wrongs in silence, and let the parties who have perpetrated them have the benefit of them in peace and quietness! Do not disturb them!

Mr. President, I believe I have said all that is necessary, certainly all that I care about saying now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. GORDON. I had hoped to correct to some extent the impressions which I presume the Senator received from the newspaper reports he has detailed to the country, because of my own personal knowledge of some of the facts in question here, as it was my fortune to be in Mississippi at the time; but as I was unable to catch what the Senator was saying at the time, I hope the debate may go over until I can read his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. EDMUNDS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 29, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Dennis, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Kernan, Key, McCreery, McDonald, Merrimon, Mitchell, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, and Withers—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Booth, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Clayton, Conkling, Cragin, Dorsey, Eaton, Edmunds, English, Ferry, Hamilton, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, McMillan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Sargent, Sherman, Spencer, West, and Wright—32.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Conover, Davis, Dawes, Jones of Nevada, Logan, Maxey, Norwood, Wadleigh, Whyte, and Windom—11.

So the motion was not agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and fifty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at four o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, December 17, 1875.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BRYON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a communication from Rutger B. Miller, a citizen of Utica, New York, in relation to the finances of the country; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PADDOCK. I present the petition of George W. Bly, commissioner, and other officers of Knox County, Nebraska, stating that the Santee Sioux Indians are occupying a part of that county, and praying that they may be removed from there during the coming spring or summer, and thus open to settlement some of the most desirable lands in that State. In fact, the removal of all the Indians upon reservations within the State to the Indian Territory south of Kansas is demanded by the unanimous voice of the people thereof. The Santee removal has been delayed long beyond the time fixed upon by the treaty, to which I have on another occasion called the attention of the Senate, and should now be undertaken at once. I hope the Committee on Indian Affairs will give the subject early and favorable consideration. I move that the petition be referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON presented the petition of Thaddeus S. Stewart, of Iowa, asking to be restored to the pension-rolls; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented additional papers in support of the claim of the heirs and legal representatives of John Rice Jones, deceased, relative to a private land claim in Illinois; which, together with the papers in that case on the files of the Senate, were referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Iowa, praying for the repeal of the act imposing a United States two-cent stamp tax on bank-checks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ENGLISH presented the petition of B. H. Douglass & Sons, of New Haven, Connecticut, praying for an amendment of the internal-revenue laws with reference to peddlers of tobacco; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of John W. Brooks and other citizens of Wolcottville, Connecticut, praying for the repeal of the act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DAWES presented the petition of the Congregational church of Ashland, Massachusetts, signed by the pastor, asking for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of William Renne and others, of Pittsfield, Massachusetts, praying for the repeal of the tax on proprietary medicines; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, presented the petition of Nicholas Williams and other citizens of West Farms, New York, asking for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of George W. Lawrence, of Damariscotta, Maine, praying for compensation for extra labor and materials required in building certain gunboats for the Government in consequence of changes made in the contract; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CONKLING presented the petition of William F. Pratt, late acting master United States Navy, praying to be placed on the retired list of the Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move that the memorial and accompanying papers of Daniel Stickney, of Maine, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. There has been no adverse report. The case was favorably considered by the committee, though I think no report was made.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask leave to have this order made:

Ordered, That the memorial of General T. T. Garrard and others, praying compensation for the destruction of the Goose Creek Salt Works, with the accompanying testimony and documents, be withdrawn from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I would like to know if there was not an adverse report in that case.

Mr. STEVENSON. So far from it, there have been two bills passed, one of which was vetoed by the President, and a unanimous report favoring the compensation. These works were destroyed by the Federal Army fearing the approach of the confederates, General Garrard himself being in the field in the Federal Army.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be made, if there be no objection.

On motion of Mr. DAWES, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of William Mason be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. CLAYTON, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Mary C. Thompson be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SARGENT, asked and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 130) for the relinquishment of the interests of the United States in city lands to the city and county of San Francisco, in the State of California; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SARGENT. This bill was reported favorably last year, and passed the Senate at that time. There were certain papers, regulations of the War Department, in reference to this matter before the Committee on Military Affairs, which I presume are on the files of the Senate. I move that they be withdrawn and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs with this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 131) to indemnify the heirs and legal representatives of John Rice Jones, deceased, for the lands sold and otherwise appropriated by the United States within the limits of certain confirmed private land claims in the State of Illinois, and to quiet titles; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 132) to repeal the tax upon bank-checks, drafts, orders, and vouchers for the payment of money; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PADDOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 133) to sell certain public lands to the Beatrice and Denver City Railroad Company, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

MISSISSIPPI ELECTION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no resolutions to be offered, the Chair will lay before the Senate the resolution pending at the close of yesterday's session.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution, submitted by Mr. MORTON on the 15th instant:

Whereas it is alleged that the late election in Mississippi for members of Congress, State officers, and members of the Legislature was characterized by great frauds, violence, and intimidation, whereby the freedom of the ballot was in a great measure destroyed, a reign of terror established, ballot-boxes stuffed, spurious tickets imposed upon voters, so that a popular majority of more than 25,000 was overcome, and in its place was given an apparent but fraudulent majority of more than 25,000; and whereas the Legislature thus chosen will have the election of a Senator to represent that State in this body; and whereas if these allegations are true a great number of the citizens of the United States have had their rights under the Constitution and laws of the United States wickedly violated: Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators be appointed by the Chair to investigate the truth of the said allegations and the circumstances attending said election, with power to visit said State to make their investigations, to send for persons and papers, and to use all necessary process in the performance of their duties; and to make report to the Senate before the end of this session of their investigation and findings.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask the Senator from Indiana if he will allow the resolution to lie over informally, so that I may move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. THURMAN. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. CONKLING. I presume there will be no objection ultimately to that motion, but I can assign some reasons to the Senator from Ohio why he should let it lie for the present, making it desirable, I think, that we should not agree to it at this moment. There are some things, I am informed, that ought to be done before we adjourn over, and I presume they will be done; but if any occasion should occur to make it necessary to sit in the morning, I think the Senator from Ohio will see clearly, as I think I do, that we had better not at this moment pass the order.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not know to what business the Senator from New York refers. I think we might as well come to an understanding at once. I hardly think it probable that the Senator from Indiana can get a vote on his resolution to-day unless we are to make a night of it; and it might as well go over until Monday. I speak now more to the ear of the Senator from Indiana, and I would like to know whether he intends to keep us here until midnight or not.

Mr. MORTON. I hoped that we might vote on and dispose of this matter and end the debate this evening. I would be glad to do so if those who desire to speak will be here and are prepared on the subject. I did not expect the Senate to sit so late as to have the vote taken at night.

Mr. THURMAN. I cannot speak with the Senators with whom I wish to consult, but I think I know enough to know that debate on this resolution will not be ended to-day. We cannot take a vote to-day unless we have a night session. There is no disposition that I have seen among Senators to waste time upon the resolution at all, but I think there is here a disposition to discuss it at a reasonable length, and therefore, unless we are prepared to "sit it out," it would be just as well to let it go over until Monday.

Mr. BAYARD. It might also be said that a number of members of the Senate some days ago, long before the resolution of the honorable Senator from Indiana was introduced, were invited by those in charge of the centennial celebration in Philadelphia to visit that city to-day. I am not one of those going; but I do not know that an arrangement has been made to be here by those going in case such a resolution as this is to be brought before the Senate to-day for its decision. I submit that to the Senator from Indiana as being one reason. I am sure that he desires the deliberation of all and the deliberate discussion of all. As a number of gentlemen arranged to go by a special train to Philadelphia this afternoon, on invitation of the centennial committee, opportunity should be given them to be present there and also be present at the Senate when this resolution is considered. I am not one of those, however; I am not affected by it, and therefore do not speak for myself.

Mr. MORTON. I have been spoken to by several Senators who have made arrangements to go to Philadelphia this afternoon, and who would be somewhat disappointed if anything prevented their going. It would be disagreeable to me to interfere with the personal convenience or pleasure of any Senator in this body in that respect; and my experience in the Senate has taught me the difficulty of holding the Senate together under such circumstances. If we can have a vote within an hour, I should be glad to have it; but if there is a purpose to debate this resolution and carry it over to-day, I shall not undertake to press it under the circumstances, much as I desire to have the resolution passed to-day. I shall, however, endeavor to call it up and have it disposed of on Monday.

Mr. THURMAN. Then I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion for a moment.

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I offer a resolution; which I ask may be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas since the last session of the Senate the Vice-President of the United States has deceased: Therefore,

Resolved, That on the 7th day of January next, at one o'clock p. m., the Senate will proceed to the election of a President pro tempore.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I offer this resolution, and ask that it lie over and be printed, in order that during the recess Senators may look up the precedents and consider the important question which has been raised in the newspapers and otherwise in respect of the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate in the event of what in the course of life is a possible contingency. Although I have no doubt that the present Presiding Officer of the Senate is the President pro tempore under the Constitution, my own present opinion is that it is advisable, if there is any possible doubt about it or difference in the precedents, that the Senate should put the question absolutely at rest. For that reason I introduce this resolution and ask to have it laid over for consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be printed and laid over.

Mr. THURMAN. I suggest to the Senator from Vermont the propriety of referring the resolution to some appropriate committee and having a report upon it—either his own committee, the Committee on the Judiciary, or the Committee on Privileges and Elections, if that is the proper one—some committee that will examine it. If it is left to everybody, nobody will do it, unless it is the Senator from Vermont himself; but if it is referred to a committee we can have a report, and I think we ought to have a report upon it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Ohio knows that I never do anything unless I am forced to do it; but I am entirely willing that the resolution should be referred to any committee suggested by the Senator from Ohio or any other Senator, so that we can have an early report on it and have it disposed of.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I suggest that the Judiciary Committee would be the proper committee.

Mr. THURMAN. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I do not seek to avoid any proper duties belonging to that committee; but it strikes me that this is a question which more properly belongs to the Judiciary Committee. I therefore move to substitute for the "Committee on Privileges and Elections" the "Committee on the Judiciary."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be printed and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SAULSBURY subsequently said: I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate, on my motion, referred the resolution offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Now I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. THURMAN. Now I renew my motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eighteen minutes spent in executive session, the doors were re-opened.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. THURMAN, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at twelve o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, December 17, 1875.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of Wednesday was read.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. BLAIR. I rise to make a correction of the Journal. On the resolution introduced on Wednesday, relating to a third term of the presidential office, I voted in the affirmative on the call of yeas and nays. I am recorded as not voting.

The SPEAKER. The Journal will be corrected.

The Journal, as amended, was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCDONALD, its Chief Clerk, informed the House that the Senate had passed the concurrent resolution of the House, that when the two Houses adjourn on Monday next they adjourn to meet on Tuesday, January 4, with an amendment, striking out "Tuesday, January 4," and inserting "Wednesday, January 5;" in which amendment the concurrence of the House was requested.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. On Wednesday last there was introduced a bill (H. R. No. 236) to give the consent of the United States to the appropriation of certain proceeds arising from the sale of swamp and overflowed lands in Alabama, which was ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Freedmen's Affairs. Subsequently that committee was abolished by order of the House. The Chair now inquires whether there is any objection to the change of the reference of the bill to the Committee on the Public Lands, its subject-matter relating to public lands.

There was no objection; and the bill was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

ENROLLED BILLS.

The SPEAKER. There is one bill, and possibly there may be more, that will require the action of the President before Monday next. There is as yet no Committee on Enrolled Bills. The Chair asks the House to indulge him in the appointment, somewhat irregular, of one gentleman as a Committee on Enrolled Bills for the present, to whom these bills may be referred for report to the House. Is there objection to such an appointment?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair then appoints as such committee the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. WADDELL.

ADJOURNMENT FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that by unanimous consent the resolution as to the adjournment over the holidays, returned by the Senate with an amendment, be taken from the Speaker's table for action.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

In line 5 strike out "Tuesday, January 4," and insert "Wednesday, January 5;" so that it will read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That when the two Houses adjourn on Monday next they stand adjourned until twelve o'clock on Wednesday, January 5, 1876.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POST-ROAD IN KENTUCKY.

Mr. KNOTT. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill and have the same read three times and passed now. After it has been read I will call the previous question, and will ask the indulgence of the House for a few minutes' explanation why it should receive immediate action.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill to declare the road leading from Concordia, Kentucky, to Mooleyville, Kentucky, a post-road.

Be it enacted, &c., That the road leading from Concordia, or Flint Island post-office, in Kentucky, to Mooleyville, in Kentucky, be, and the same is hereby, declared to be and established as a post-road.

Mr. KNOTT. Mr. Speaker, Concordia is situated on the Ohio River, and the town of Mooleyville is four and a half miles from it.

Mr. CONGER. I understood the gentleman to call the previous question, and I believe debate is not in order.

Mr. KNOTT. I asked leave to make a very brief explanation.

Mr. CONGER. I grant the gentleman leave.

Mr. KNOTT. I was remarking that these towns are four and a half miles apart. The town of Concordia is on the Ohio River and Mooleyville is four and a half miles in the interior. Notwithstanding this, the mails which are intended for Mooleyville are carried eighteen miles from there down the river to Stephensport, where they lie over from a day to two and a half days, and are then carried out into the interior of the county, where they lie over two other days, and are then carried seven and a half miles back; so that it is apparent to the House that there is as much circumlocution required to supply the people of Mooleyville with their mail matter as is ordinarily required to run down a claim in the Treasury Department. [Laughter.] I have laid this matter before the Post-Office Department, and the Department heartily concurs in the measure, and desires to have the bill passed at the earliest possible moment, in order that, if the route is established, it may go into the advertisements in March. I will ask the Clerk to read a communication from the Assistant Postmaster-General which I send up.

The Clerk read as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., December 15, 1875.

SIR: You are respectfully informed that the change of service petitioned for by residents of Mooleyville and recommended by you is approved by the Postmaster-General, but no steps can be taken by the Department until the road from Mooleyville to Flint Island has been declared a post-road by act of Congress.

Should Congress take action in time, the route petitioned for would be inserted in the advertisement of March next, and, if let, service would begin July 1, 1876.

Very respectfully,

J. C. SLATER,
Acting Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Hon. J. PROCTOR KNOTT,
House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the passage of this bill without the formality of the previous question?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not rise to object to this bill, but inasmuch as it is exceedingly important for the safety of legislation that the regular order should be observed, after this I shall insist upon the regular order.

The bill (H. R. No. 282) received its several readings, and was passed.

Mr. KNOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the regular order of business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The call of States for resolutions, &c., will be resumed. The call now rests with the State of Missouri.

CHANGE OF NAME OF STEAMER.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 283) to change the name of the steamer Tom Jasper, of Saint Louis, Missouri; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I desire to have this bill put upon its passage, and will ask for the previous question.

The bill was read. It gives authority to the owner of the steamboat Tom Jasper, of Saint Louis, to change the name of said vessel to that of Centennial, by which name the said steamboat shall be hereafter known.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is a bill that ought to go to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I ask permission to explain the object of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will hear the gentleman's explanation.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. The steamboat Tom Jasper was an upper-river steamboat, a small vessel of five hundred tons, built in 1857. It has been enlarged to one thousand tons, and has had new boilers, and its cabin has been enlarged, so that it may run upon the lower river. I am informed that it will be ready to run in thirty days, and it is necessary to have an act of Congress passed to change the name. As I have stated, there has been a large increase in the dimensions of the vessel, and it is very important to the owner that the bill should pass at this time. I presume there can be no objection to it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the passage of this bill without the formality of the previous question?

Mr. CONGER. I must object to the passage of the bill now.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. Then I must insist upon the previous question.

The question was put on seconding the demand for the previous question; and on a viva voce vote the Speaker declared it seconded.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the gentleman from Missouri to let there be a little discussion on so novel a proposition as this. I hope he will not insist upon the previous question.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I have already stated to the gentleman that I am advised by the owner of the vessel that she will be ready to take her course on the river within thirty days, and the vessel has been changed throughout.

Mr. CONGER. Congress has refused for a number of years to give a new name to an old vessel. They have refused it, because under the new name the traveling public may be enticed on board an old and unsafe vessel, and a large number of lives have been lost by just such changes of names. There has been no instance for the last six years where the name of a steamboat or commercial vessel has been changed; Congress has steadily refused to do it.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. The gentleman's argument cannot hold good in this case, for the reason that the hull of this vessel has been enlarged and made nearly new throughout; new boilers have been put in, the cabin has been extended and enlarged, and the tonnage of the vessel raised from five hundred to one thousand.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from Missouri will allow this bill to be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I have here letters from the owner of the vessel, and if there is no objection I ask that they be read.

The Clerk read the letters, as follows:

SAINT LOUIS, December 6, 1875.

DEAR SIR: I amthe owner of the steamer Tom Jasper, built in the year 1867, at Madison, Indiana, for the Saint Louis and Quincy Packet Company, and am at present rebuilding her for the Saint Louis and New Orleans trade, increasing her dimensions and carrying capacity fully five hundred tons, retaining the cabin, machinery, and boilers of the old boat, and as much of the hull as the inspector of the board of underwriters will allow me to use, and it is my desire, on account of the trade that I am building for, to have her name changed. The person whom she was named after lives in Quincy, Illinois, and is not known below Saint Louis, and consequently gives her no prestige in the trade contemplated. The maritime laws of our country require a special act of Congress for that purpose, and I take the liberty, being a citizen of Saint Louis, and having the work done here, to ask you to get an act through Congress granting me that privilege. Should anything be necessary on my part, please advise me at your earliest convenience, as I expect to have her completed and ready for business in the next forty-five days. An early reply will very much oblige,

Yours, respectfully,

THOS. L. DAVIDSON.

Hon. ERASTUS WELLS, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

SAINT LOUIS, December 14, 1875.

DEAR SIR: Your valued favor of December 8 received. The name desired is Centennial.

Yours, respectfully,

THOS. L. DAVIDSON.

Hon. ERASTUS WELLS, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. HOLMAN. I again ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WELLS] to consent that this bill take the usual course and be referred to the Committee on Commerce. For many years past, except under very peculiar circumstances, no changes of names of vessels have been made, for manifest public reasons.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. My experience for the last six years is that there never has been a bill presented to this House asking for a change in the name of a vessel but what it has been granted; at least that has been the case so far as my memory goes.

Mr. HOLMAN. If my friend had been upon the Committee on Commerce for the past six years, he would be aware that this subject of changing the names of vessels is one of the most embarrassing subjects that committee has been called on to consider, and that it has received more attention than perhaps any other subject connected with the commerce of this country. I call for tellers on seconding the call for the previous question.

Tellers were not ordered; and the previous question was accordingly seconded.

The question was upon ordering the main question.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 69, noes 61; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WELLS, of Missouri, and Mr. CONGER were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported there were—ayes 88, noes 69.

So the main question was ordered; which was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. CONGER. I consider this a very important question to be decided at the beginning of this session; and therefore I call for the yeas and nays upon the engrossment and third reading of this bill.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 123, nays 96, not voting 70; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ainsworth, Ashe, Atkins, Bagby, Blackburn, Bland, Bradford, Bright, Buckner, Horatio C. Burchard, Samuel D. Burchard, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, William P. So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill; and being taken, upon a division there were—ayes 121, noes 82.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TILL MONDAY.

Mr. BRIGHT moved that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, STATE OF LOUISIANA.

By John McEnery, governor of the State of Louisiana.

In the name and by the authority of the State of Louisiana:

Know ye that I have nominated, constituted, and appointed, and by these presents do nominate, constitute, and appoint, Robert H. Marr United States Senator from the State of Louisiana, in accordance with section 3876 Revised Statutes of Louisiana, to fill a vacancy created by the resignation of Hon. William L. McMillen; and I do authorize and empower him to execute and fulfill the duties of that office according to law, and to have and to hold the said office, and all the powers, privileges, and emoluments to the same, from and after the date hereof.

In witness whereof I have hereunto signed my name and caused the great seal of the State to be affixed, at the city of New Orleans, this 16th day of December, in the year of our Lord 1875, and of the Independence of the United States of America the ninety-ninth.

[SEAL.] JOHN McENERY.

By the Governor:

Y. A. WOODWARD,
Assistant Secretary of State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will lie on the table.

Mr. WINDOM presented five petitions, signed by Aaron Burlingame and 625 other citizens of Sauk County, Wisconsin, praying for the extension and speedy completion of the Fox River improvement and for the construction of a canal along the bank of the Wisconsin River from Portage City, Wisconsin, to the Mississippi River; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of Theodore Löwe, a crippled soldier of the late war, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ANTHONY. I introduced a joint resolution the other day authorizing Rear-Admiral John J. Almy, United States Navy, to accept a decoration from the King of the Hawaiian Islands. I now present in connection therewith a copy of an autograph letter of the King of the Hawaiian Islands. I move its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print extra copies of the President's message, have directed me to report back the same and ask to be discharged from its further consideration. It has been customary until within a few years to print extra copies of the President's message, but since it has been sent by telegraph, or certainly in advance by mail, it is entirely useless to do so. The message was read by the whole country, and, I may add, approved and admired, of course, by us, and it is not considered necessary to print extra copies now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee will be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution, if there be no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, apnounced that the House had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the concurrent resolution of the House providing for an adjournment of both Houses until Tuesday, the 4th of January next.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 329) to remove the political disabilities of George Jackson, a citizen of West Virginia.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 78) to extend the duration of the court of commissioners of Alabama claims; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 139) to reimburse the State of Oregon for moneys paid by said State in the suppression of Indian hostilities during the Modoc war, in the years 1872 and 1873; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 140) for the relief of B. P. Patterson; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL AND STATE RIGHTS.

Mr. McDONALD. I desire to give notice that when the question comes up I shall offer resolutions, and move their adoption, as a substitute for the resolutions offered by my colleague [Mr. MORTON] on the 15th instant on the subject of national and State rights.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate takes notice.

Mr. MORTON. I suggest to my colleague to introduce his resolutions now and let them be printed.

Mr. McDONALD. I desire to introduce them hereafter when the subject shall be properly before the Senate.

Mr. MORTON. We do not want to be taken by surprise. [Laughter.]

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have a resolution to submit, and before I offer it, or in connection with it, I wish to state, referring to a resolution that I introduced on last Friday touching the President of the Senate, that a further consideration of the subject, and some discussion of it, have led me to think that the public interests require that the question should not be open to any doubt during the interval between this day and the day of our next assembling. I therefore offer the following resolution and ask its present consideration:

Resolved, That Mr. THOMAS W. FERRY, a Senator from the State of Michigan, be the President of the Senate until January 7, 1876, and until a fresh appointment shall be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none, and the question is on its passage.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not rise to interpose any objection to the consideration of the resolution, but it seems to me this resolution involves one of the questions which are now committed to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, namely, whether, the present incumbent of the chair having been appointed at the last session of the Senate of the United States, and having been in possession of the office of President pro tempore upon the happening of the death of the Vice-President, that does not perforce continue him. That I understand to be one of the questions involved in the inquiry directed to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. This resolution assumes that such is not the fact, and I call attention to it, without, however, making any objection whatever to the resolution offered by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have drawn this resolution in such a way as not to assume that we do not have a President pro tempore of the Senate at this very moment. The resolution does not declare in terms that he is appointed; it declares that he shall be; he may continue to be; he is already. If there is any legal quibble upon which he is not already the President of the Senate in the constitutional and legal sense, then this resolution cures it for the time being until inquiry shall be made and any step be taken upon this subject that the Senate chooses. I think, therefore, that we do not commit ourselves to anything except to the fact and the law that, pending this recess and until the Senate does act, we have a President of the Senate in the full constitutional and legal sense.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I ask that the resolution of the Senator from Vermont be again read.

The resolution was read by the Chief Clerk.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I move to substitute the name of "ALLEN G. THURMAN, of Ohio;" and upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware moves to amend the resolution by substituting for the name of "THOMAS W. FERRY, of Michigan," the name of "ALLEN G. THURMAN, of Ohio;" and upon that amendment the yeas and nays are requested.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Chief Clerk called the roll.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. WRIGHT] was called suddenly home by illness in his family. I also desire to say that for this day I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON.] Regarding this as a political question, I decline to vote.

Mr. PADDOCK. I desire to state that on this question I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM,] who, if present, would vote for the amendment, and I against it.

Mr. KELLY, (who had at first voted in the affirmative.) I ask leave to withdraw my vote, as I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. WADLEIGH] upon all political questions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote will be withdrawn, if there be no objection.

Mr. CRAGIN, (who had at first voted in the negative.) I ask leave to withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. NORWOOD] upon all political questions. I was not aware that this question would arise or that the pair went so far.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote will be withdrawn, if there be no objection.

Mr. STEVENSON, (who had at first voted in the affirmative.) I voted under a misapprehension. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] and I agreed to pair, though it was rather confined to the pending resolution offered by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON;] but inasmuch as the Senator from Pennsylvania is not here, I desire to withdraw my vote. This question was not contemplated at all; but still, as he may believe that I am paired with him, I prefer to respect his wishes, and I therefore withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote will be withdrawn, if there be no objection.

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Eaton, English, Gordon, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Kernan, Key, McCreery, McDonald, Maxey, Randolph, Saulsbury, Wallace, and Withers—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Booth, Boutwell, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Conkling, Dawes, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Sherman, Spencer, West, and Windom—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Bruce, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Christiancy, Clayton, Conover, Cragin, Dorsey, Ferry, Goldthwaite, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Logan, Merrimon, Norwood, Oglesby, Paddock, Patterson, Ransom, Robertson, Sargent, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, Whyte, and Wright—27.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the original resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MORTON. In voting for this resolution, I desire not to be understood as expressing any opinion upon the question as to whether we had a President pro tempore before this resolution passed. I voted for the resolution in the spirit in which it was offered, as a mere matter of precaution.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to offer a resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators, permit me to interrupt the business of the Senate by tendering my thanks for the renewal of your courtesy and confidence.

STEAMBOAT INSPECTORS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting, by bill or otherwise, some measure to increase the efficiency of the service of steamboat inspectors.

I desire merely to say that if the accounts published in the newspapers in relation to a recent loss on the Pacific coast are true, there has been a shameful neglect on the part of inspectors, by which a large number of lives have been lost. I therefore desire to call the attention of the Committee on Commerce to this subject, so that, if possible, the service of inspectors may be made more efficient.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

CHANGE OF STEAMER'S NAME.

Mr. BOGY. I ask to have a bill, passed by the other House and sent here this morning, to change the name of the steamer Tom Jasper, of Missouri, now put on its passage by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill which the Senator has named?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is rather unusual to do such a thing. I should like to hear the bill read before we are called on to vote upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. With the permission of the Senate, the Chair will lay before the Senate bills from the House of Representatives.

The bill (H. R. No. 283) to change the name of the steamboat Tom Jasper, of Saint Louis, Missouri, was read twice by its title.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I think that ought to go to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BOGY. I will state for the information of the Senate that the bill was passed by the House after having been discussed and examined. The boat is ready to be launched. This is the case of a small boat of very limited tonnage which has been enlarged, and indeed built as a new boat. She is now taking in her freight at Saint Louis, and there is no time to be lost. It is important the thing should be done now, if it be done at all. The matter was thoroughly examined and understood in the House last week, as will be seen by reference to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and the bill passed there after debate. This was formerly a steamboat called the Tom Jasper, running on the Upper Mississippi, which has been changed and made into a large boat, with new boilers and new machinery, and inspected by the Government officers. It is in point of fact a new boat, and yet enough of the old boat remains, the cabin, for instance, to compel the owner to retain the name of the old boat unless it be changed by Congress.

Mr. BOUTWELL. With that explanation I withdraw any objection.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It gives authority to the owner of the steamboat Tom Jasper to change the name to that of Centennial.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 329) to remove the political disabilities of George Jackson, a citizen of West Virginia, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

POST-ROAD IN KENTUCKY.

The bill (H. R. No. 282) to declare the road from Concordia, Kentucky, to Mooleyville, Kentucky, a post-road was read twice by its title.

Mr. McCREERY. Mr. President, since the meeting of Congress I have occupied less than one minute of the time of the Senate. I hope, therefore, that members will repress their inclination to object, at least till they understand what I want. [Laughter.] I move for the present consideration and passage of the bill. It has been acted upon by the House and recommended by the Postmaster-General, and meets the approbation of the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have it read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill. It declares the road leading from Concordia, or Flint Island post-office, in Kentucky, to Mooleyville, Kentucky, to be a post-road.

Mr. HAMLIN. I will state for the consideration of the Senate, that the present post-road which reaches those points is very much in the nature of a triangle. They are at the Department very soon to relet the mail service on those routes. If this amendment shall pass, they will cut across a point of the angle, and will perform the service which they now perform with about four miles of distance saved; and as they will very soon be preparing their advertisements, and as this will save transporting the mail over four or five miles of route that we are now transporting it over, I think it as well that the bill should pass.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You will add more transportation instead of making it shorter.

Mr. HAMLIN. O, no.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I fear the mail will be run both ways.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MISSISSIPPI ELECTION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further resolutions the Chair will call up the unfinished business, which is the resolution of the Senator from Indiana, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. MORTON on the 15th instant, providing for the appointment of a special committee to inquire as to the recent election in Mississippi.

Mr. EATON. I rise to ask the Senator from Indiana whether he will not consent to postpone the resolution to a future day. I should like to have it go over until after the holidays.

Mr. MORTON. I will state that I have been advised that there will be further debate on this resolution, and I am also advised that a number of Senators want to leave the city this afternoon. I should be very glad myself to have the resolution disposed of, but I shall not attempt to press it under the circumstances if Senators desire to have it go over. A number of Senators are absent, and others, I am told, are just ready to leave; and if the discussion were prolonged I should expect to find the Senate without a quorum this afternoon.

Mr. THURMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the commissioners of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company of the District of Columbia are hereby directed to communicate to the Senate a detailed statement of the assets of said company remaining undistributed and of the assets collected or changed in any way since the day of their report transmitted to the House of Representatives on the 14th of December, 1874.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHERMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 141) to amend an act entitled "An act amending the charter of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1874; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAWES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 142) providing for the purchase of a site and the construction of buildings for a girls' reform school in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 143) providing for the removal of the Walla Walla, Cayuse, and Umatilla tribes and bands of Indians onto a permanent reservation, and to open to settlement the Umatilla reservation in Oregon; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 144) to provide for the construction of a telegraph line from Fort Canby, via Fort Stevens and Astoria, to Portland, Oregon; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 145) for the further improvement of the Willamette River, Oregon; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 146) extending the time for the completion of the Oregon Central Railroad and telegraph line from Portland to Astoria and McMinnville, in the State of Oregon; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEVENSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 147) to refund to William Watts, of the county of Boone and State of Kentucky, the sum of $5,610, illegally taken and received from him and paid into the Treasury of the United States by the collector of internal revenue for the sixth Kentucky district, in excess of the amount of lawful tax collected upon the sale of 28,031 pounds of manufactured tobacco on the 28th day of June, 1864; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest to the Senator from Kentucky that that bill should go to the Committee on Claims, unless there is some special reason why it should be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. STEVENSON. The Committee on Finance is the proper committee. All claims growing out of revenue have gone to the Committee on Finance. This is a claim for an illegal tax exacted on the article of tobacco contrary to law, which has already gone into the Treasury of the United States. The usage of the Senate, so far as my experience goes, has always been to refer such bills to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask for the reading of the title.

The title of the bill was read.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is simply to pay a private claim, and it seems to me it ought to go to the Committee on Claims. The mere fact that the claim grows out of the collection of revenue ought not to control its reference.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It evidently is not a bill to raise revenue.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a mere private bill.

Mr. STEVENSON. I have not the slightest objection to the reference of the bill to the Committee on Claims. I am sure, however, that the archives of the Senate will bear me out in saying that such bills have been referred to the Committee on Finance since I have been in the Senate. I know I have seen reports on bills precisely like this from the Finance Committee, both adverse and favorable; but if the chairman of the Committee on Finance thinks it ought to go to the Committee on Claims I have no objection, and will move its reference to that committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ought to remark, though I do not now recall a case, that claims made by officers of the internal revenue have been sent to the Committee on Finance, but even then it is very doubtful whether that reference was proper. Certainly I do not now recall any cases of claims of private citizens which have been referred to that committee and reported by it, though perhaps there may have been such cases.

Mr. BAYARD. I think the Senator from Kentucky is quite correct as to the custom of the Committee on Finance taking cognizance of claims of this character, which are based upon an error by the collection officers of the Government. Since I have been upon that committee a great many claims of that character have been submitted to me, and reports have been made upon measures for the relief of persons claiming sums which were paid through error or under a misconstruction of law by the revenue officers. I merely say that as matter of fact, though as the Senator from Kentucky has amended his motion the subject is of no great importance.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to say one word. I think there have been instances where cases of this kind have been referred to the Committee on Finance without objection. I can myself recall cases, however, where references have been made to the Committee on Finance, and they have reported them back to the Senate, and they have then gone to the Committee on Claims. I think as a rule they have gone to the Committee on Claims, where in my opinion they more properly belong.

Mr. STEVENSON. As to the precedent, I think claims of this character have always been referred to the Committee on Finance. So claims strictly military in their character, arising purely out of transactions with the Army, or asking for compensation touching military reservations, have always been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. Such has been the action of the Senate for twenty years; but if it is proposed now to refer everything to the Committee on Claims, and that no claim which is private in its nature shall go to any other committee, I acquiesce with pleasure and agree that such bills shall go that way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill will be referred to the Committee on Claims. The Chair hears none, and it will be so referred.

Mr. CONKLING, (by request,) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 148) authorizing the President of the United States to nominate William Welch to the grade of commander in the United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 149) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KELLY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 150) to provide for the removal of the Walla Walla, Cayuse, and Umatilla Indians from the Umatilla reservation in Oregon and for the sale of their lands; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DORSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 151) to define certain crimes and the punishment thereof; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SARGENT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 152) relating to the promotion of commodores on the retired list of the Navy; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 153) to grant the right of way for railroad purposes through the United States arsenal grounds near Benicia, California; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SARGENT. In the last Congress there were some papers—memorials and maps—relating to this matter which were before the Committee on Military Affairs. I presume they are now on the files of the Senate. I move that these papers be referred, with the bill, to the Committee on Military Affairs, and that the bill be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 154) for the relief of Lewis Rose and other persons, claiming title to lands within the lines of the military reservation at San Diego, California; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SARGENT. This bill was introduced at the last session by my then colleague, (Mr. Hager,) and was sent to the Committee on Public Lands. I move that this bill be referred to that committee and that the papers on file in the case be withdrawn to accompany it, and that the bill be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLAYTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 155) to amend sections 533, 556, and 572 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

He also (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 156) authorizing terms of the United States district court to be held at Fort Gibson, Indian Territory; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 157) to further provide for the redemption of legal-tender United States notes in accordance with existing law; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It is perhaps proper to state that I introduce this bill on my own responsibility solely. I assume that there are no Senators here who propose to repeal the law for the resumption of specie payments passed at the last session; and it is only my purpose in introducing this bill to make that law easier of execution, and to remove any apprehension as to its derangement of the business interests of the country. I shall to-morrow, after the morning hour, ask leave to submit some remarks in explanation of the bill and in relation to the general financial topics involved. I move that it lie on the table and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARVEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. Thompson, late captain First South Carolina Volunteers, afterward Thirty-third United States Colored Troops; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOOTH asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 164) in relation to fruit-brandy, and to punish frauds regarding the same; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BOOTH. As this bill relates to the collection of the tax on brandy, I move that it be referred to the Committee on Finance and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 165) for the relief of Michael W. Brock, of Meigs County, Tennessee, late a private in Company D, Tenth Tennessee Volunteers; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 166) to amend section 1225 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

sideration then, a resolution relating to the services and public character of the late Vice-President of the United States.

HYDROGRAPHIC SURVEY OF ARKANSAS RIVER.

Mr. DORSEY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard be, and the same is hereby, directed to inquire and report whether the interests of the General Government do not demand that a complete hydrographic survey be made of that portion of the Arkansas River between Fort Smith, in the State of Arkansas, and Pueblo, in the Territory of Colorado, to determine whether that portion of said river is now, or can be made, navigable by the removal of any obstruction that may be in existence.

MILITARY ARRESTS IN ALASKA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further resolutions, the Chair will lay before the Senate the resolutions lying on the table. The first is one submitted by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] on the 16th of December; which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to furnish the Senate, if not incompatible with the public service, with a statement of the number of military arrests made in the Territory of Alaska during the past five years, together with the date of each, the charge on which made in each case, the names of the persons arrested, and the period and character of the imprisonment of each in that Territory before trial or surrender to the civil authorities for trial.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to the resolution; but as it calls for a large amount of information, which may be voluminous or may not be—I do not know which—I think it had better be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. If they report it back I certainly shall vote for it; but I think all these resolutions of inquiry, calling for a large amount of work to be done by the Departments, ought to be referred to the proper committees. I therefore make the motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will observe to the Senator from Ohio that the Senator who offered the resolution is not in his seat.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it lie on the table then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie on the table for the present, if there be no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will call up the next resolution on the table, which is the concurrent resolution submitted by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] on the 15th of December.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I understand that my colleague [Mr. MCDONALD] desires to offer certain resolutions as a substitute for mine, and he is not present to-day. I am also advised that other Senators desire to debate the question; therefore I ask to have it lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over, if there be no objection.

The order was agreed to.

Mr. MORRISON. I move the adoption of these resolutions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the committee rise and report the resolutions.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and, the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WHEELER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the condition of the Union generally, and particularly the message of the President of the United States, and had directed him to report certain resolutions in relation thereto.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the report of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. KASSON. Before the report is adopted I should be glad to have again read the resolution referring matters to the Committee on Ways and Means, especially the part relating to the greenback issue.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa requests the reading of the resolution disposing of so much of the message as relates to the subject of the currency commonly called greenbacks. The Clerk will again read the resolution.

The resolution referring portions of the President's message to the Committee on Ways and Means was again read.

Mr. KASSON. I should like to call the attention for a moment of the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency as well as that of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means to the question, which seems always to be left a little in doubt, as to which committee is to take charge of that part of the message which relates to the legal-tender currency. By virtue of the terms of its organization the Committee on Banking and Currency has jurisdiction of all that relates to the currency of the country as well as banking. I desire to call the attention of the chairmen of those two committees to this point, in order that, if possible, they may avoid any conflict on the question, and come to some understanding as to the disposition of those portions of the President's message which relate to the legal-tenders.

Mr. MORRISON. In the division of labors the duties upon this subject of the two committees sometimes necessarily lap. The subjects are so near akin to each other, that in the discharge of the duty of separating the labors of the committees it is almost impossible to separate them so that they shall not clash in some respects; but we have followed the precedents, and kept within the line of duties of the respective committees as they are prescribed by the rules of the House. I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolutions.

Mr. BANKS. Before the gentleman presses the previous question I will ask that, before the House is called to vote upon these resolutions, that part of the resolutions referring to the portion of the message relating to the subject of expatriation and the rights of American citizens in foreign states, proposed to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, shall be read. We have a right to have it read before being called upon to vote upon it.

The resolution with reference to the Committee on the Judiciary was again read.

Mr. BANKS. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, who reported this resolution, to the fact that the legislation of this country which relates to the rights of American citizens abroad and the subject of expatriation has come in every instance heretofore from the Committee on Foreign Affairs. It is not a question of domestic legislation, but it is a question of foreign interests in connection with foreign governments; and such subjects have always been referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and that committee reported the first and most important legislation on this subject ever adopted by any parliamentary assembly. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will listen to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and allow the matter to be referred to that committee.

Mr. SWANN. I desire only to say with reference to this resolution that it did not arrest my attention at the time it was read in committee. It seems to me that the subject belongs properly to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. It involves a great many questions of importance connected with our foreign relations, and I believe the custom has been heretofore to refer all questions relating to foreign relations to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I trust, therefore, that the gentleman from Illinois will allow that subject to be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs instead of sending it, as now proposed, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to admit the motion of the gentleman from Maryland, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, who proposes that the question of expatriation and the rights of American citizens abroad be referred to that committee?

Mr. MORRISON. This subject was very fully considered by the Committee on Ways and Means, and it was by them considered that it embraced a legal proposition which would very properly go to the Committee on the Judiciary. The Committee on Ways and Means have no preference as to which committee shall take charge of it, and as the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs thinks that it more properly belongs to his committee, if the House has no objection, I say for the Committee on Ways and Means that they have none. I therefore admit the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois consents to admit an amendment, so far to amend the report of the Committee on Ways and Means as to refer so much of the message and documents as relates to the subject of expatriation and the rights of American citizens abroad to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. COX. My friend from Illinois, by his resolutions, has indicated to what committee certain matters connected with the currency should go. Of course we all know that it is the most delicate question connected with our legislation. Many currency bills have already been referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. They relate to both greenbacks and national-bank notes. If the resolutions now reported to the House from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union should be passed, they cannot and do not change the rule of the House. We have had this discussion here before. I have the rule in my hand, and in behalf of the committee of which I am chairman I beg simply to read it in protest against any wrong interpretation when we hereafter refer bills. That rule is as follows:

152. It shall be the duty of the Committee on Banking and Currency to take into consideration all propositions relative to banking and the currency as shall be presented or shall come in question, and be referred to them by the House, and to report thereon by bill or otherwise.

I suppose it lies, therefore, within the pleasure of the House hereafter to send what bills may be presented on the currency to either of these committees, irrespective of resolutions which come from the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I desire to say that there is nothing in the rule which prevents the subject of legal-tenders from being referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. They are a part of the currency of the country. In the last Congress they were referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, while the Committee on Banking and Currency took charge of the bill which provided for the resumption of specie payments. But we all know very well that those two committees were at cross-purposes with regard to that great matter of the currency, when it would have been best for them to be entirely in accord. Therefore I say that I trust the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, [Mr. MORRISON,] will so far consent to a modification of this resolution as to permit the matter of legal-tenders to be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I do not regret that this question has been raised. It has been raised before, and been discussed very fully and freely in the House. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] has correctly stated, during the last Congress the Committee on Ways and Means did consent, in a spirit of conciliation and kindness to the Committee on Banking and Currency and against its own conviction of right in the premises, to permit this question of greenbacks to go to that committee. But I think it is well for the House to understand precisely the relative powers of those two important committees of the House.

It will be remembered that originally the Committee on Ways and Means comprehended within its jurisdiction not only everything pertaining to the ways and means of the Government but also appropriations and also matters in reference to the Pacific railroads and matters with reference to every question of a fiscal character, whether State or national. In 1865, after the passage of the national banking act and after the duties which had been imposed upon the Committee on Ways and Means became so numerous and impossible of performance by that committee, it was suggested by the Committee on Ways and Means that there be a division of the duties which had been devolved upon that committee. The Committee on the Rules took that question into consideration, and my honored friend and colleague [Mr. COX] was the chairman of the subcommittee on the Rules which made the report to the House. That report provides for taking from the Committee on Ways and Means everything pertaining to appropriations and making a new standing committee for the purpose of considering those matters; also everything pertaining to banking and currency to be referred to a Committee on Banking and Currency; and everything relating to the Pacific railroad companies and to the credit of the Government which had been loaned to them, and the establishment of a Committee on the Pacific Railroad to consider those subjects.

Now, that the House may more distinctly understand precisely what the Committee on Rules understood to be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and what my colleague understood to be the limitation upon the functions of that committee, I ask the Clerk to read from the report made at that time by Mr. COX, of New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. COX. I rise to a privileged question. I call up and withdraw the motion to reconsider the vote by which the report of the Select Committee on the Rules of the House of Representatives was ordered to be printed, in order that it may be brought before the House for action. I do not think that it will detain the House long, and may be disposed of now as well as at any other time. I ask the Clerk to read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Select Committee on the Rules of the House of Representatives report the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That Rule 74 be amended so as to add to the standing committees to be appointed at the commencement of each Congress, and to consist of nine members each:

"Committee on Appropriations.

"Committee on Banking and Currency.

"Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

"Said amendment to take effect from and after the close of the present Congress.

"Resolved, That the following be added to the standing rules of the House from and after the close of the present Congress:

"Rule —. It shall be the duty of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad to take into consideration all such petitions and matters or things relative to railroads or telegraph lines between the Mississippi Valley and the Pacific coast as shall be presented or shall come in question and be referred to them by the House, and to report their opinion thereon, together with such propositions relative thereto as to them shall seem expedient.

"Rule —. It shall be the duty of the Committee on Ways and Means to take into consideration all reports of the Treasury Department and such other propositions relative to raising revenue and providing ways and means for the support of the Government as shall be presented or shall come in question and be referred to them by the House, and to report their opinion thereon by bill or otherwise, as to them shall seem expedient.

"Rule —. It shall be the duty of the Committee on Banking and Bank Currency to take into consideration all propositions relative to banking and the currency as shall be presented or shall come in question and be referred to them by the House, and to report thereon by bill or otherwise.

"Resolved, That from and after the close of the present Congress Rule 76 be amended as follows: Strike out all after the word 'consideration,' in line 2, to and including the word 'expenditure,' in line 6, and insert in lieu thereof 'all executive communications and such other propositions in regard to carrying on the several Departments of the Government as may be presented and referred to them by the House.'

"Strike out in line 1 the words 'Ways and Means' where they occur, and insert in lieu thereof the words 'on Appropriations.'

"Resolved, That from and after the close of the present Congress Rule 77 be amended by striking out the words 'of Ways and Means,' and inserting in lieu thereof the words 'on Appropriations.'"

Mr. COX. I have nothing to say in relation to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, for I think that will recommend itself to the House at once.

In relation to the division of the Committee on Ways and Means, I desire to show the importance and immensity of the labor imposed upon that committee, with a view to a division of the labor. It is not proposed, as seems to be inferred by some gentlemen, to strike out the Committee on Ways and Means, although it might appear so on a superficial reading. We still preserve the Committee on Ways and Means eo nomine; and if the rules are properly read with the amendments it will so appear.

We divide the Ways and Means into three committees. The Ways and Means are still preserved and their future duty is to provide "ways and means," that is, raise revenue for carrying on the Government. This includes, of course, the tariff, the internal revenue, the loan bills, legal-tender notes, and all other matters connected with supporting the credit and raising money.

* * * * * * *

As to the Committee on National Banks and Currency, that is not necessarily connected with the other committee. They have a different province. They have in charge all the bank interests of the country. These interests are so connected by the relation of exchanges and currency with bank issues and banking capital in the States, that it is as much as one committee can well do to study these questions properly. It is utterly impossible in the present condition of our finances that one committee can do all this labor, and do it as well as these interests demand.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Mr. Speaker, it will be observed that the chairman of the subcommittee on the rules which made this report to the House gave a construction to the rule itself; that he distinctly declared that it was not intended or designed to take from the Committee on Ways and Means control over the question of the United States notes, commonly called legal-tenders; and with that construction put upon it the House adopted the report of the Committee on the Rules. Hence we have this standing committee.

Now, sir, as I understand the proposition of the Committee on Ways and Means now presented to the House by the chairman, it proposes to give to the Committee on Banking and Currency everything appertaining to the question of currency so far as the banks are concerned. But the legal-tender note is simply a debt of the Government of the United States; those notes constitute the non-interest-bearing debt of the Government, and that question is reserved in terms to be considered by the Committee on Ways and Means, who have exclusive jurisdiction over everything appertaining to the question of the public debt. Hence the committee in considering this question, anticipating that probably some gentlemen might deem that there was an attempt to interfere with the proper functions of the Committee on Banking and Currency, have in my judgment appropriately and properly provided for the reference to the Committee on Banking and Currency of that which legitimately belongs to them, and have reserved to themselves simply what was designed originally to be left to them.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call attention to the action of the House at the last session on the distribution of the President's message. The honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] is, I think, mistaken in stating that the resolutions then adopted conceded the jurisdiction of this question to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. No, sir. If the gentleman will pardon the interruption, he has misunderstood me. Mr. DAWES, then chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, conceded to Mr. Maynard, the chairman of the other committee, that that committee might have the subject.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. It was conceded that they should have jurisdiction of the question of specie resumption by or through the national banks. That was our understanding, and I think the understanding of the House, at that time. To show that such was the understanding, let me call attention to the fact that the President in his message discussed specie resumption and recommended to the consideration of Congress two measures; one the retirement and cancellation of legal-tender notes, the other as an accompanying measure for free banking. The consideration of the question of free banking was conceded by the Committee on Ways and Means and by the House to the Committee on Banking and Currency; but the question of retiring legal-tenders was by the resolutions reported by the Committee on Ways and Means and adopted by the House referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, language being adopted which was satisfactory to the chairmen of both those committees.

I ask for the reading of the resolutions distributing the last annual message of the President of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That so much of the annual message of the President of the United States to the two Houses of Congress at the present session, together with the accompaning documents, as relates to finance and taxation, to the receipts into the Treasury, to deficiencies in the revenue, to the public debt and the public credit, the revision of the tariff and internal-revenue laws, to retiring and funding United States notes, and to the ways and means of supporting and meeting the liabilities of the Government, be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

* * * * * * * *

Resolved, That so much of said message and documents as relates to banks and banking, to the currency, and resumption of specie payments be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. The House will notice that by the first resolution just read that portion of the message relating to the United States notes—legal-tender notes—was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, while in the subsequent resolution so much as related to currency and specie resumption was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. In the pending resolution it is proposed, in like manner, that so much of the annual message of the President as relates to specie resumption through the national banks be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, while so much as relates to legal-tender notes shall be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. The precedents are all in accord with the resolutions as reported by the committee, and therefore it seems to me the House should adopt them.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, when this point was raised it was not my intention in any way to antagonize the resolution offered by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, [Mr. MORRISON.]

When that amendment of the rules was reported from the Committee on Rules on the 2d of March, 1865, the idea was to divide the labor, so that the Committee on Ways and Means should take charge of measures to bring money in; the Committee on Appropriations, measures to pay it out; the Committee on Banking and Currency, measures relating to the kind of money. That was the general division. Hence, when I gave an interpretation to that rule, I included in the matter of ways and means that which pertained to the credit of the Government. "Greenbacks" was understood to be a part of their functions. But it is generally impossible to separate the Banking and Currency Committee from their duties with reference to the currency, and it is utterly impossible to separate the Ways and Means from that which raises the credit—the issuing of notes. Hence, as we have had in our past experience so in the future, these two committees are bound more or less to confer, and they will confer in the future as in the past.

I propose not to make any amendment to the resolution of my friend from Illinois; but when these various bills come up in the House for reference the House will determine under the rule which of the bills will go to one committee and which to the other. I have no more to say.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, in connection with what the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] has just said, I would like to call his attention and that of the House to the fact that the distinction made in the successive distributions of the President's message is a philosophic one. They refer all questions relating to the greenback to the Committee on Ways and Means. As was suggested by the other gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] the greenback is a part of the national debt. But it is more than that, sir. It is money. It is the current money of the realm. It is the legal-tender with which all private debts and almost all public debts may be paid. It is the substance of which currency is the shadow. Checks, drafts, bills of exchange, bank-notes, are liquidated in money, and therefore propositions touching that which is at once part of the debt of the country and the legal-tender money of the country have always been referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, charged with the provision of revenues for the support of the Government; while questions relating to currency, to that which circulates as a medium of exchange, to that which may be received in payment of debt, but which is not money because it is not a legal tender and therefore may be refused by creditors, but which is not money more than gold was in India, or is to-day, or than silver is in England beyond the sum of forty shillings. The greenback, though without intrinsic value, is money, as the credits of the Bank of Venice were for nearly five hundred years, ruling steadily at from 10 to 30 per cent. above the par of gold and silver. Bank-notes are its shadows, for they are redeemable in greenbacks. They are connected with the system of banking, with private currency, and the philosophic distinction between money and private or corporate currency has always been maintained. The House has always referred that which related to the current money of the realm to the Committee on Ways and Means, and that which related to currency to the "Committee on Banking and Bank Currency," as one of the resolutions quoted phrases it, which committee is charged specially with the consideration of questions of banking and those forms of currency which, though they perform many of the functions of money, are not money, but currency—evidences of corporate or private credit subject to liquidation in money which is always legal-tender in payment of debts.

Mr. MORRISON took the floor.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me a few minutes before debate is closed on this subject?

Mr. MORRISON. I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania for a few minutes.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Banking and Currency, I am very sure, does not want to draw to itself any more questions concerning this most vital subject now before Congress, in various bills already presented, than it can possibly help; but there are some members of the committee who consider the currency of the country as the life-blood of the commerce of the nation, and that it should be homogeneous in its character. I know very well that to the Committee on Ways and Means, in former sessions, was assigned the question as to emission of legal-tenders for the payment of current national debts.

Part of the duty that that committee were bound to inquire into was as to the best means of paying off the national debts then arising and meeting the expenses of the war. They came to the conclusion that it would be well to issue what are now called legal-tenders. They not only did that for the payment of accruing debts, they not only made them a debt of the country, but they went beyond that and gave them another character, almost precisely similar with that of the national-bank-note currency, with the exception that they are made a legal tender in payment of all debts except for duties on imports. I say these were part of the functions of the Committee on Ways and Means. When they made the provision in the law that the legal-tenders should become the currency of the country, they then, almost necessarily, referred it over to the jurisdiction of the Committee on Banking and Currency. Such was the logical result.

The rule of the House says that the Committee on Banking and Currency shall have charge of the consideration of all measures concerning the currency of the nation; and the legal-tenders are as much the currency of the nation to-day as are the bank-notes, the bank-notes, however, being superior to them in some respects, in having three securities to the legal-tender's one.

I say, then, Mr. Speaker, that it is the proper and appropriate function of the Committee on Banking and Currency to take into consideration all the mediums of currency of the country. Suppose, for instance, that this should be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and they should report in favor of contraction; suppose, on the other hand, that the Committee on Banking and Currency should be in favor of expansion, or vice versa; here would be two committees pulling in contrary directions on this most important subject, and there would be no homogeneousness given to the consideration of what is the life-blood of the commerce, external and internal, of the nation, its currency, in whatever it may consist. I therefore submit to the House that it is right and proper that this subject should be committed to a single committee; that that committee should be the Committee on Banking and Currency, and that that committee should go over the whole field, study the whole question in all its bearings and relations, and make its report to the House, by bill or otherwise, when the proper time should arrive.

Mr. MORRISON. I now yield for a moment to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] after which I give notice that I will call the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. We have had this debate, Mr. Speaker, at the opening of every session, when the distribution of the President's message was under consideration; and the fact is that down at the bottom of the subject there is a real collision between the functions of the two committees. No man can mark off the boundary-line which separates the two jurisdictions and say everything falls naturally on the one side or the other. The legal-tender note, in its origin and character, is a bond, a debt, and again it is currency; so that so long as we have this form of money, as my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] prefers to call it, we shall always have this collision. I hope we may avoid any bitterness or even any irritation about it by means of the suggestion so wisely made by the gentleman from New York. Let the resolutions stand as they are, and let the House use its own sense whenever a bill is introduced to determine where the bill ought to go. For instance, when the question was resumption by free banking, that very naturally went to the Committee on Banking and Currency, which had charge of what was the chief instrument proposed as a method of resumption. But if resumption is proposed by redeeming legal-tender notes—that is, by paying the public debt—it properly goes to the Committee on Ways and Means. When the question is the accumulation of gold to make the resumption, that is a question of ways and means.

If gentlemen will look over the President's message, they will find that the three suggestions made by the President in reference to the resumption of specie payments all refer to methods connected with the ways and means of the Government, so that, so far as the President's message is concerned, that part of it which relates to specie payments should go to the Committee on Ways and Means, because of the character of the recommendation. I say this, agreeing perfectly with the suggestion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency. I wish, however, to remark that we seem in our print of the Digest to have left out one word in the original rule as passed by the House in 1867. The committee was there designated as the "Committee on Banking and Bank Currency." For some reason or other, we seem to have dropped out the word "Bank." If that word were in, as it doubtless ought to be in an authentic print of the rule, it would throw a good deal of light on the spheres of the two committees. It is the Committee on Banking and Bank Currency, and does not by its title have jurisdiction of currency generically, but only of that particular kind.

Mr. KASSON. I ask permission of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means to say a single word. It is this: That if this resolution is adopted, as I presume it will be, (and I do not oppose it,) I desire it may be distinctly understood by the House and the country that original legislation touching the payment or redemption of the notes known as legal-tender or greenback will be with the Committee on Ways and Means, and not with the Committee on Banking and Currency. I distinctly wish to have that understood—for one at least, and for others around me here—that the question will be with that committee.

Mr. MORRISON. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment of Mr. SWANN was adopted.

The resolutions, as amended, were then agreed to.

Mr. MORRISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to make a very brief statement and upon it to base a request to the House. The gentleman from New York, Mr. HEWITT, now a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, desires to be relieved from service on that committee, because, arising out of his private relations and business, there will frequently come up, if he remains on that committee, conflicts between duty and interest; wherefore he very properly desires to be relieved from service on that committee. His colleague, Mr. ELY, who is now on the Committee on Foreign Affairs, is willing and desires to exchange places with his colleague, Mr. HEWITT; they can thereby adjust themselves to the business of the House with more satisfaction to both. The Chair therefore requests that the House permit this exchange to be made. It is somewhat out of order, but it seems to be an entirely proper thing to do. If the Chair hears no objection, the places of the gentlemen on the committees will be transposed. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

Mr. HARDENBERGH also presented a joint resolution (H. R. No. 19) relative to the centennial celebration in the several counties of the several States, and asked the unanimous consent of the House that the resolution be now adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Jersey demands the previous question on the passage of the resolution, which, as the Chair understands, provides merely for a reference to a committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. The proposition of the gentleman, as I understand, is to adopt the resolution, which seems to me a very proper one, as I think the House will see when it understands the nature of it.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. Allow me just one moment in order to say——

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the resolution be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That it be and is hereby recommended by the Senate and House of Representatives to the people of the several States that they assemble in their several counties on the approaching centennial anniversary of our national independence, and that they cause to have delivered on such day a historical sketch of said county from its formation, and that a copy of said sketch may be filed in manuscript in the clerk's office of the said county, and an additional copy in manuscript be filed in the office of the Librarian of Congress, to the intent that a complete record may thus be obtained of the progress of our institutions during the first centennial of our existence.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I ask the gentleman from New Jersey to allow the resolution to be amended so as to provide that these historical sketches may be filed in print or manuscript. I presume that they will generally be printed.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. I accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] and modify the resolution in the manner he has proposed. In order to save time I withdraw the demand for the previous question, and ask that the resolution be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on the Centennial Celebration; though, if the House would act on the resolution now, I would much prefer it, because the States everywhere throughout the country are taking action relative to the Centennial.

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to a question of order. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not unless the gentleman from New Jersey withdraws his demand for the previous question.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. I believe I must insist on that demand.

Mr. BANKS. I hope the gentleman will not ask the House to adopt this resolution. It is certainly imperfect in its form, and will not produce the effect desired. I should be glad to say a word on the subject, if permitted. I hope the resolution will be referred.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. I move, then, that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Centennial Celebration, and be ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

WORKINGMEN OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, I have here a petition signed by fourteen thousand of the workingmen of the District of Columbia, as I am informed, asking that the Committee on the District of Columbia may make certain inquiries in regard to the late action of the board of public works, and as it is a very important document, out of the usual course, I ask it may be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I also ask that it be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman does not want all the names printed in the RECORD?

Mr. O'BRIEN. I merely ask that the memorial be printed in the RECORD without the names.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The petition is as follows.

Petition of the workingmen of the District of Columbia, praying Congress for relief, and asking for an investigation; also showing amount still due to each laborer for daily labor performed in the District.

The undersigned, your petitioners, the workingmen of the District of Columbia, respectfully represent that they are residents of the cities of Washington and Georgetown and of the other towns, suburbs, and localities included in said District of Columbia; that they have been employed under the late board of public works of said District to work on inaugurated improvements under said board of public works and superintendents of said board.

Your petitioners further represent that the said superintendents, when returning the time of your petitioners, neglected to return the full number of days that your petitioners worked and were legally entitled to.

Your petitioners further represent that numbers of them were entirely left off the rolls as returned by the superintendents to the commissioners of the District of Columbia for payment; and your petitioners, the workingmen of the District of Columbia, who worked under the late board of public works proper, have not been paid in full by the commissioners of the District of Columbia or by any of the said superintendents of the said late board of public works of the District of Columbia.

Your petitioners further represent that some of the superintendents of the late board of public works aforesaid are non-residents of the District of Columbia, and during the time they were engaged as superintendents under said board of public works kept no record of your petitioners' time. Said superintendents cannot now be found in said District, and your petitioners in consequence have not received adequate remuneration for work performed under said superintendent or superintendents, as aforesaid stated.

Your petitioners further represent that the old corporation of the city of Washington passed the following resolution, fixing by law the pay of laborers of the city of Washington at $2 per day, and for horses and carts not less than $3 per day. Said resolution reads as follows:

"The pay of laborers of this corporation shall be not less than $2 per day, and for horses and carts not less than $3 per day, from and after the passage of this resolution."

Said resolution became a law of said city of Washington on the 27th day of March, A. D. 1867, and the successors in office of the late corporation of the city of Washington, to wit, the late board of public works of the District of Columbia, usurped the law made and provided in the premises. Said law fixing the pay of laborers having never been repealed by the Legislature of the District of Columbia, or by the Congress of the United States, was in full force during the administration of affairs in the District by the board of public works and also by the commissioners of the District.

Your petitioners further represent that the board of public works of said District, contrary to the above law made to adequately compensate your petitioners for daily labor, arbitrarily reduced your petitioners' wages to $1.50 per day, and horses and carts to $2.50 per day; and your petitioners have presented for payment their claims for the extra fifty cents per day illegally withheld from your petitioners by the board of public works, and also by the commissioners of the District of Columbia, and the commissioners referred the matter to their attorney, who declined to consider the claims of your petitioners; and your petitioners, knowing full well the power of the late Washington "ring," deemed it advisable to wait until Congress convened and present the matter in full to them, instead of having or commencing a lawsuit against the commissioners as the successors in office of the late board of public works, which lawsuit could be prolonged for an almost indefinite period, and the costs of feeing counsel accumulating upon your petitioners until they would be absolutely compelled to abandon the suit for want of means to further continue it.

Your petitioners therefore pray an appropriation from your honorable body adequate to pay your petitioners the fifty cents per day illegally withheld, and also a positive law compelling the commissioners or their successors in office to pay the amount to each of your petitioners whose names shall appear on the pay-rolls of the late board of public works, or on any of the pay-rolls of the commissioners, or of any of the pay-rolls of the District of Columbia, including Georgetown and all other localities included in said District, from the 27th day of March, A. D. 1867, down to the present day.

Your petitioners further represent that Congress passed an act, which act was approved on the 23d day of June, A. D. 1874, in which act is incorporated a proviso as follows:

"And provided further, That the sum of $75,000 of said sum hereby appropriated shall be used for the payment of workingmen employed on public improvements on the streets and excavations of Washington under the board of public works of the District of Columbia or the contractors of the same; and the commissioners are hereby authorized and ordered to retain from the several contractors who are indebted to the workingmen, and whose accounts have not been settled by the board of public works, the several sums due the workingmen."

Your petitioners further represent that said proviso has not been liberally construed and fully carried into effect by the commissioners of the District of Columbia, and your petitioners have suffered to the amounts of hundreds of dollars each; and that your petitioners' counsel, John Pope Hodnett, called the attention of the commissioners to the law, but your petitioners and their counsel could get no satisfaction from the said commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Your petitioners further represent that they several times called the attention of the board of audit of said District of Columbia to the act of Congress ordering the commissioners to stop amounts due to the workingmen from each contractor before a final adjustment of the contractor's account by said board of audit, but your petitioners could get no satisfaction, and they and their counsel were grossly insulted and most of their papers showing the indebtedness of each contractor to your petitioners were destroyed; and powers of attorney duly attested and acknowledged have been stolen from the office and have never since been found, or, if in the office, have never been produced and have been totally abrogated.

Your petitioners further represent that, in consequence of the connivance or collusion of the contractors with the clerks of said board of audit of the District of Columbia, your petitioners, the workingmen of the District of Columbia, have been defrauded by the contractors for whom your petitioners worked, and who have been paid or certificates of indebtedness issued to them by the said board of audit; which certificates have been sold by the contractors without payment in full being made to your petitioners.

Your petitioners further represent that the late Hon. Henry T. Blow, late commissioner for the District of Columbia, went, in behalf of your petitioners, to the board of audit and protested against any certificates being issued to any contractor without first deducting the amounts due your petitioners; but still the action of Mr. Blow availed but little, for the contractors were paid without payment in full being made to your petitioners by the said contractors.

Your petitioners, the workingmen of the District of Columbia, further represent that they cannot get the warrants of the District of Columbia cashed, either at the Treasury of the United States or at the collector's office of the District of Columbia, and they are put to the greatest inconvenience and often hardship, sometimes having to pay a large percentage to the banks to cash the warrants of the treasurer of the District.

Your petitioners therefore respectfully request the passage of a law ordering the treasurer or collector of the District of Columbia to cash the warrants of the treasurer of the District of Columbia when indorsed and witnessed according to law and presented by the party to whom the warrant is made payable or the party or party's legal representative; also imposing a fine on any of the banking-houses of the District of Columbia who refuse to cash the warrants of the District when properly indorsed.

Your petitioners feel it their duty to call the attention of Congress to the disgraceful and unlawful manner in which the affairs of the District are conducted, and to ask Congress to place the affairs of the workingmen of the District in the hands of a labor bureau, as they are satisfied they can receive no justice from the commissioners, the board of audit, or the contractors.

Your petitioners further represent that they are dependent upon their daily wages for the support of their families, and if they are defrauded and robbed continually, and the laws set at defiance by those placed in power to see them faithfully executed, they must follow the example of the workingmen of France and New York, and by this means save themselves and their families from starvation, ruin, and annihilation.

Your petitioners pray Congress for an adequate appropriation to pay all the laborers of the District who worked under the board of public works proper, and also under the contractors, subcontractors, their agents and legal representatives.

Your petitioners therefore earnestly ask for the appointment of a select committee of the House of Representatives of five members to inquire into the affairs of the contractors of the late board of public works of the District of Columbia; of the paymaster, auditor, and comptroller of the late board of public works of the District of Columbia, and also into the affairs of the commissioners and board of audit of said District.

Your petitioners believe that they can prove to the satisfaction of Congress and the country the most shameless abuse of power, usurpation, fraud, bribery, and corruption on the part of the commissioners and the board of audit of the District of Columbia.

The wholesale and lawless manner in which your petitioners have been robbed and defrauded out of their wages compels them to demand an investigation that will thoroughly search and probe the whole thing to the bottom and expose the wrong-doers.

Your petitioners call the attention of Congress to the numerous mass-meetings held and resolutions passed on this question alone in the District of Columbia within the last two years, and ask that said resolutions and petitions be made part of this petition, and that they be printed with this petition for the action of Congress and the information of the people.

Your petitioners have reliance on Congress to do them justice, to grant an investigation as prayed, and put an end to the Washington "ring" once and forever.

Signed on behalf of the workingmen of the District of Columbia.

STEAM WAR-VESSELS AUTHORIZED BY ACT OF FEBRUARY 10, 1873.

Mr. GOODE also submitted the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be respectfully requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to inform the House of Representatives whether the eight steam-vessels of war authorized by the act of February 10, 1873, have been constructed, and, if so, what has been the cost of the construction of each of said vessels, and the aggregate cost of the same.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

MANAGEMENT OF THE NAVY-YARDS.

Mr. GOODE also submitted the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire and report whether any material belonging to the Government has been fraudulently or wrongfully removed from the navy-yards, or any of them, and whether there has been any unlawful combination for the purchase of the same; also, whether the public money appropriated for the construction of the eight steam-vessels of war authorized by the act of February 20, 1873, or any part thereof, has been misapplied for political purposes, or was in any manner used to promote the success of the republican party; and especially whether any portion of said money, or any other money appropriated for the use of the Navy Department, has been paid to incompetent persons, possessing no mechanical skill, who have been employed in the Government navy-yards upon the condition, expressed or implied, that they would vote for the nominees of the republican party; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] object to substituting for the words "republican party" the words "either political party?" If we were to go back for a few years, the doings of the other party might perhaps be found worth investigating.

Mr. GOODE. That was before the deluge. I prefer the resolution in its present form.

Mr. LAPHAM. I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. WOOD, of New York.) An amendment is not in order.

Mr. LAPHAM. Let the amendment be read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

After the word "republican," wherever it occurs in the resolution, insert the words "or democratic."

Mr. GOODE. I rise to a question of order. I had moved the previous question, and submit that an amendment is not in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order. The amendment is not in order.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. If the House shall refuse to second the demand for the previous question, would the amendment then be in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unquestionably.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I desire to make an inquiry of the gentleman who offers the resolution. As I understood the reading of it, the resolution provides for ascertaining what property has been fraudulently abstracted from the navy-yard. It does not specify what navy-yard.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. LAWRENCE. If the resolution is designed to apply to the navy-yard in the gentleman's own district, it should so state.

Mr. GOODE. I specify all the navy-yards of the Government.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I ask that the resolution be again read.

The Clerk again read the resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the gentleman from Virginia to consent to a modification of that resolution so as to strike out the words "the republican party" and insert the words "any political party."

Mr. GOODE. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. HALE. In that case there will be no objection to the resolution on this side of the House.

Mr. KASSON. Is that amendment agreed to?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that the modification is accepted.

Mr. KASSON. Then there is no objection to the resolution.

Mr. CONGER. Has the same alteration been made in the last clause of the resolution?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair so understands.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

ONANCOCK CREEK, VIRGINIA.

Mr. DOUGLAS submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of the survey and examination of Onancock Creek, Virginia, with a view to the improvement of the navigation thereof.

FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I submit the preamble and resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk, and I ask the previous question.

The Clerk read the preamble and resolution, as follows:

Whereas the failure of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, chartered by act of Congress approved March 3, 1865, has resulted in great loss and injury to large numbers of freedmen depositors therein; and whereas the causes of and responsibility for such failure have never been fully inquired into or ascertained by any committee or by any order of Congress; and whereas said failure is believed to have been caused by gross mismanagement of the officers and agents of said company and by unauthorized and illegal employment and use of the funds of the corporation:

Be it resolved, That a committee of seven members be appointed by the Speaker to investigate the affairs of said Savings and Trust Company and its several branches, and to ascertain and report to the House all matters relating to the management of the same, the cause or causes of failure, the parties responsible therefor, and the nature, character, and value of all collaterals and other securities held by said company and its branches for loans or investments of the funds of the same; that said committee also ascertain and report the names and residence of all debtors of said Savings and Trust Company, with the amount respectively due by them, the time when the debts were severally contracted, and the kind, description, and value of the securities given by said debtors respectively, with such other facts relating thereto as the committee may deem important and necessary to a full understanding and elucidation of the subject-matter of the investigation.

And be it further resolved, That said committee and any sub-committees thereof shall have power to send for persons and papers, to summon witnesses, and to administer oaths. And the said committee or sub-committees may sit during the recess of Congress, and may at any time report progress in their investigation, and shall have leave to employ a clerk and such other experts as may be required to aid therein.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. What is the number of the committee?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The number named in the resolution is seven members.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I suggest to the gentleman that he make it the ordinary number on committees, so that all parties shall have a representation thereon. If the number is so small, members may be detained or absent, and only one side would have representation. I trust that he will make the committee the usual number.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have no objection to such a modification of the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What number does the gentleman desire to have inserted?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I suggest nine.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I suggest to the gentleman from Virginia that he change the phraseology of the preamble by substituting the word "alleged" for "believes."

Mr. DOUGLAS. I was going to make that change, and will so modify it, and also change the number of the committee from seven to nine.

Mr. RANDALL. I would further suggest to the gentleman from Virginia that he should modify the resolution by striking out that part which gives the committee authority to sit during the recess of Congress. If it should appear hereafter necessary that they should its during the recess, well and good; we can then give them that authority; but, with the gentleman himself, I believe that this investigation should be speedy and prompt, and therefore suggest to him that he strike out that part of the resolution. I hope that before we adjourn this terrible corruption and terrible fraud committed upon the colored people throughout the country will be exposed, and the guilty men given to the public gaze.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If the resolution will be made more acceptable by striking out that provision, I certainly have no objection; for, like the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] I believe this investigation should be prompt, and the result of the investigation should be given to the country; and since he suggests that the power to sit during the recess may be hereafter given if necessary, I will accept the modification suggested.

The resolution, as modified, was then adopted.

Mr. DOUGLAS moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PACIFIC RAILROAD SUBSIDY BONDS.

Mr. LAWRENCE also submitted the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be and are instructed to inquire what legislation, if any, may be necessary, just, and proper to secure indemnity to the United States for advances of interest paid and to be paid by the Treasury Department on account of subsidy bonds issued to the several so-called Pacific railroad companies, and to secure indemnity against liability to pay the principal of such bonds, either by requiring the creation of sinking funds or otherwise, as may be proper; and that the committee report by bill or otherwise.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Has not the gentleman made a mistake in the reference? Should not this subject go to the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. LAWRENCE. No, sir; it should go to the Judiciary Committee; it involves judicial questions purely.

I will state that by the recent decision of the Supreme Court, as I understand it, it is determined that the Government is, in the first instance, bound to pay the interest on the subsidy bonds issued to the so-called Pacific railroad companies. At the maturity of the bonds the railroad companies will owe the Government for advances of interest. There is no earlier means of re-imbursement except that the Government is entitled to apply one-half of the freight charges on freight carried by these companies for the Government as credits on advances of interest. But when the subsidy bonds mature the railroad companies may be worthless, and the Government may not be able to collect a dollar. If I understand the argument of the Attorney-General correctly, this decision of the Supreme Court involves a liability of about $200,000,000 on the part of the Government, including the interest on advances. All this may be lost to the Government unless provision now be made to secure it against loss.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman withdraw his demand for the previous question? He has no right to debate the proposition in its present stage.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I did not wish to debate further than to make this statement. I will ask, however, to incorporate in the RECORD the statement I hold in my hand. I believe there will be no objection to the adoption of the resolution. It merely directs the Committee on the Judiciary to report legislation which may be appropriate. I think there can be no objection to that.

The statement, which I take from one of the ablest newspapers of the country, is as follows:

The main facts in the condition of the Union Pacific Railway Company merit more attention than they are receiving from the public. The contest of the company against applying its earnings from Government freight to pay a small part of the current interest on the United States bonds lent to it brings its condition into prominence. This company received from the United States over twenty-seven millions in bonds. The company refuses to pay the interest, save so much as one-half its charges on Government freight amount to, and it is not laying by any sinking fund to meet interest or bonds. By the maturity of the bonds the interest will amount to over thirty-two millions. If we make the large allowance of one-third as paid in freight, the balance of arrears of interest will be over twenty-one millions, making the principal and arrears of interest of the United States loan forty-eight millions.

The company issued its own bonds for thirty millions, and made these a first mortgage. This will make, on the maturity of the United States bonds, a bonded indebtedness of over seventy-eight millions. The road is one thousand and thirty-two miles long; therefore it will have a bonded debt of over $75,000 per mile. No one believes it cost $40,000 a mile to build and equip the road. Besides this, there was issued stock to the amount of forty-five millions. This raises the liabilities to one hundred and twenty-three millions. That is to say, they will amount to this at the maturity of the United States bonds, which were for twenty years. This is over $119,000 per mile, being treble what it cost to build the road. In addition, the company received 12,000,000 acres of land. The location of the road made some of these immediately valuable, and the company realized on them. They are selling what are worth anything of the rest, and putting the money in their pockets.

When the twenty years shall have expired, dating from 1864, what is valuable of the lands will be gone, and there will be left on the worn-out road a load of one hundred and twenty-three millions of liabilities, of which over seventy-eight millions will be in bonded debt, namely, forty-eight millions to the United States, and thirty millions in first-mortgage bonds. Does any one fancy that any set of managers would try to carry along the road with such a load? Honest management, which came into possession under such circumstances, would at once declare the road bankrupt. What shall we expect from such managers as it has? How easy to default on the first-mortgage bonds, and have the road sold, and buy it, thus wiping out the Government loan and all its arrears of interest and the stock? The wonder is that, with this robber game so plainly displayed, the stock sells for anything at all, save as a means of getting control of the plunder. Yet it is quoted at about eighty. Shares of moonshine would be about as safe for investment.

This only relates to one of the railroad companies, but it may be well to know the condition of all. The investigations already made by Congress show the necessity for this.

I present also the following statement, illustrative of this subject, from the last annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury:

I hope the resolution will be adopted. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. LAWRENCE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PROTECTION OF POSTAL RIGHTS OF THE INSANE.

Mr. MONROE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 452) to protect the rights of the inmates of asylums for the insane; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

SUPERVISING SURGEON-GENERAL OF THE MARINE-HOSPITAL SERVICE.

Mr. MONROE also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 453) extending the privilege of the Library of Congress to the Supervising Surgeon-General of the Marine-Hospital Service; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed.

EDUCATION.

Mr. MONROE. I submit the following resolution, which I ask be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is commonly admitted that the general education of the people is indispensable to the prosperity and even to the continued existence of a republic in which the responsibilities of suffrage are universal; and whereas the last census reveals the alarming fact that more than one-fifth of the population of the United States above the age of ten years is unable to read or write, and that nearly one-fourth of all the legal voters of the nation is in this condition of illiteracy; and whereas this want of the rudiments of knowledge among those who elect the officers of the State and nation exists largely by the act of the National Government through the extension of the right of suffrage and in States which are disabled by the waste and impoverishment of war from making adequate provision for the support of common schools; and whereas our soundest jurists have held, with Judge Story, that the Constitution confers the power upon Congress, in the exercise of a sound discretion and with proper regard to the just autonomy of the States, to apply the money raised by taxation to the promotion of the general welfare of the United States: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Education and Labor be requested to inquire in regard to the expediency of making moderate appropriation from the Treasury, upon the ratio of illiteracy, for the voluntary acceptance of States which have established or will establish a permanent system of common schools for the education of all their youth, and supported, in fair proportion, by the taxation of their own people; and that the said committee report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to hear that resolution read again, as it seems to be a very important one.

Mr. MONROE. It is only offered for reference, and not for adoption.

Mr. RANDALL. If only offered for reference, I have no objection. It should be referred for consideration by one of the committees. If the gentleman desires to pass the resolution at this time, then I have something to say on the subject.

Mr. MONROE. I would like to say a word too, but I do not think I can be allowed just now. I merely offer the resolution for reference.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Would it be proper to include in the reference of this resolution to the committee that it shall never come back again? [Laughter.]

Mr. BUCKNER. I object to its going in the RECORD, as requested.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It must go in the RECORD, as it has been read from the Clerk's desk.

Mr. MONROE. I introduced the resolution with the whereases simply for the purpose of reference to a committee. It will be printed in the RECORD, and gentlemen can read it there.

Mr. RANDALL. It simply goes on the RECORD on the authority of the gentleman who offers it.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Whereas the people of the United States have lately passed through an internecine war, in which one section of the country has been arrayed against the other, brother against brother and father against son; and whereas we owe the preservation of the Union, the establishment of peace, and the enforcement of law and order to the bravery and patriotic devotion of the loyal soldiers of the Union and its cause: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, That we recognize the brave and gallant services rendered by the loyal soldier to his country in the time of its greatest need and peril, and that we do earnestly recommend to the people of our common country the utmost care and watchfulness over the rights and interests of these brave men, securing to each one in need employment, and to such and their families the necessaries and common comforts of life; and in all cases of public employment and in the bestowment of the emoluments of office, that, all other things being equal, the soldier should have the preference over the civilian; and, as one branch of the legislative department of this Government, we are in favor of laws being enacted by Congress giving liberal pensions to the diseased and crippled soldiers, and to the widows and children and dependent fathers and mothers of those who have died of wounds or diseases contracted while in the service of the Union Army, and to each living soldier, and to the widows and heirs of those dead, such bounties and homesteads as a generous Government can afford to those who have won and preserved to the nation its unity and Constitution.

Mr. MORRISON. I send to the Clerk resolutions which I ask to have read and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the several committees of this House having in charge matters pertaining to Indian affairs, military affairs, naval affairs, post-office and post-roads, public lands, public buildings and grounds, claims and war claims, be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire, so far as the same may properly be before their respective committees, into any errors, abuses, or frauds in the administration and execution of existing laws affecting said branches of the public service, with a view to ascertain what change and reformation can be made so as to promote integrity, economy, and efficiency therein; that the Committees on Expenditures in the State Department, in the Treasury Department, in the War Department, in the Navy Department, in the Post-Office Department, in the Interior Department, in the Department of Justice, and on Public Buildings, be, and they are hereby, instructed to proceed at once, as required by the rules of the House, to examine into the state of the accounts and expenditures of the respective Departments submitted to them, and to examine and report particularly whether the expenditures of the respective Departments are justified by law; whether the claims from time to time satisfied and discharged by the respective Departments are supported by sufficient vouchers, establishing their justness both as to their character and amount; whether such claims have been discharged out of funds appropriated therefor, and whether all moneys have been disbursed in conformity with appropriation laws; whether any, and what, provisions are necessary to be adopted to provide more perfectly for the proper application of the public moneys and to secure the Government from demands unjust in their character or extravagant in their amount; whether any, and what, retrenchment can be made in the expenditures of the several Departments, without detriment to the public service; whether any, and what, abuses at any time exist in the failure to enforce the payment of moneys which may be due to the United States from public defaulters or others; and to report, from time to time, such provisions and arrangements as may be necessary to add to the economy of the several Departments and the accountability of their officers; whether any offices belonging to the branches or Departments, respectively, concerning whose expenditures it is their duty to inquire, have become useless or unnecessary; and to report, from time to time, on the expediency of modifying or abolishing the same; also to examine into the pay and emoluments of all offices under the laws of the United States; and to report, from time to time, such a reduction or increase thereof as a just economy and the public service may require. And for the purpose of enabling the several committees to fully comprehend the workings of the various branches or Departments of Government, respectively, the investigations of said committees may cover such period in the past as each of said committees may deem necessary for its own guidance or information, or for the protection of the public interests, in the exposing of frauds or abuses of any kind in said Departments; and said committees are authorized to send for persons and papers, and may report by bill or otherwise.

Resolved further, That the Committee on Public Expenditures be instructed to investigate and inquire into the matters set forth in the foregoing resolution in the legislative department of the Government, except in so far as the Senate is exclusively concerned, and particularly in reference to the public printing and binding, and shall have the same authority as is conferred upon the other committees aforesaid.

The motion was agreed to; and the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

APPOINTMENT OF UNION SOLDIERS.

Mr. FORT submitted the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the doctrine just announced by the House in the resolution of the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. CASON) is so wise and just that in the judgment of this House it should be followed by officers of the House in filling subordinate places under their authority, and that in all such cases they are hereby instructed to give to well-qualified Union soldiers preference over soldiers of the late confederate army.

Mr. MORRISON. I hope my colleague will allow that to be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, to inquire whether "things are equal," in accordance with the terms of the resolution of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. CASON.]

Mr. FORT. I demand the previous question, and want the resolution voted on exactly as it is.

Mr. MORRISON. Then we will vote it down for you.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 57, noes 88.

Mr. FORT demanded tellers on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order to move to refer that resolution to the Committee on the Centennial Celebration?

The SPEAKER. It will, if the demand for the previous question be not seconded.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. When in order, I make that reference.

Mr. FORT. That cannot be done during my demand for the previous question. I have called for tellers on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. FORT and Mr. SPRINGER were appointed.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 78, noes 103.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Now, Mr. Speaker, I believe it is in order to move the reference of this resolution.

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. As this is the centennial year, the year in which we are to forget all our past dissensions, and difficulties, and controversies, I move to refer this to the Committee on the Centennial Celebration.

Mr. HALE. Let us have the yeas and nays on that.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I demand the previous question on my motion to refer.

Mr. FORT. I wish to make a suggestion.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to debate.

Mr. FORT. We have had debate from that side on this question.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to debate. I do not think we ought to be detained any longer by this resolution.

Mr. ROBBINS, of Pennsylvania. I move the House adjourn.

APPOINTMENT OF UNION SOLDIERS.

The House refused to adjourn.

Mr. FORT. I hope the gentleman from New York will allow the committee to be authorized to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. WOOD, of New York. No. I demand the previous question on my motion to refer.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. FORT. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to refer.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COX. I ask that the resolution be again read. It is a big thing.

Mr. FORT. It is a big thing. That is exactly what I want.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. MILLS. Is it in order to move an amendment to that resolution?

The SPEAKER. The motion is not amendable, as the main question has been ordered.

Mr. FORT. It is well understood that this motion to refer is made by the other side to kill my resolution.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE.

Mr. MORTON. The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred the following resolution—

Whereas, since the last session of the Senate, the Vice-President of the United States has deceased: Therefore,

Resolved, That on the 7th day of January next, at one o'clock afternoon, the Senate will proceed to the election of a President pro tempore— beg leave to submit a report on the subject; and I ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) That order will be made.

Mr. COOPER. As one of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, I am unwilling, differing as I do from some of the conclusions arrived at by the majority of the committee, to permit the report to be presented to the Senate without entering my dissent to certain conclusions of the committee. I refer especially to the conclusion that the President pro tempore of the Senate holds his position at the will of the Senate. I think the power to elect that officer is alone vested in the Senate by the Constitution upon the happening of certain contingencies therein specified; that the exercise of such power exhausts it so long as the contingency remains upon which the power to act was given.

Mr. MERRIMON. I also desire to say that I dissent from so much of the report as asserts the power of the Senate to remove the President pro tempore at the will and pleasure of the Senate. At the proper time I shall ask the Senate to indulge me in submitting my views upon the subject.

Mr. DORSEY. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and printed.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest to the Senator from Arkansas that the bill should go to the Committee on the Judiciary. I believe that bill was before that committee at the last session, and I think it appropriate that it should go there.

Mr. DORSEY. I think that the Senator is mistaken in regard to this bill, which is for the sale and disposition of the Hot Springs reservation.

Mr. WRIGHT. I understand that; but I think that question was before the Committee on the Judiciary at the last session.

Mr. DORSEY. I think not, Mr. President. I do not think it has ever been before Congress in any shape.

Mr. WRIGHT. If the Senator insists that the bill shall be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, I shall not make objection now; but I think the bill was before the Committee on the Judiciary at the last session, and I think it appropriately ought to go there.

Mr. DORSEY. I do not know that any bill on this subject was ever before any committee of the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I suggest to the Senator to let the bill lie upon the table until to-morrow morning, and meanwhile he can ascertain whether it has been before the Committee on the Judiciary heretofore or not.

Mr. DORSEY. Very well; let the bill lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be entered by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection. The order to print will also be made.

DEATH OF THE VICE-PRESIDENT.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. If there is no further business, I ask that Senate bill No. 157 be taken up.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If the Senator from Vermont will allow me, I wish to state that, upon consultation with my colleague, I desire to qualify the notice which I gave yesterday in the Senate in regard to the announcement of the death of the Vice-President, and to say that, in consequence of the illness of one of our colleagues in the other House, I am not prepared at present to name a day when the resolutions will be proposed.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I now move that Senate bill No. 157, to provide for the redemption of legal-tender United States notes in accordance with existing law, be taken up.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. As it is very brief, I ask that the bill be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

A bill to further provide for the redemption of legal-tender United States notes in accordance with existing law.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That to further enable the Secretary of the Treasury to provide for the redemption of the legal-tender United States notes, in accordance with existing law, he is authorized to issue, sell, or dispose of, at not less than par in legal-tender United States notes, either of the descriptions of the bonds of the United States, bearing interest at a rate of not exceeding 4½ per cent. per annum, described in the act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," with like qualities, privileges, and exemptions, to the extent necessary to carry into full effect the act of Congress approved January 14, 1875, entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," and to use the proceeds thereof for the purposes aforesaid. And the said legal-tender notes so obtained upon the issue of said bonds shall be held and considered as a part of the final redemption of such notes provided for in the act of Congress herein last mentioned, and shall be treated accordingly and canceled: Provided, That the principal of the bonds herein authorized may be made redeemable at any time after not less than thirty nor exceeding forty years from the date of issue.

SEC. 2. That all contracts entered into or made after the 1st day of January, A. D. 1878, shall be payable in accordance with the legal-tender standard of gold and silver, unless otherwise provided at the time of the contract.

SEC. 3. That all national banking associations shall be, and hereby are, required to hold in coin as part of their lawful money reserve, on and after the 1st day of January, 1877, one-fourth; after the 1st day of January, 1878, one-half; and after the 1st day of October, 1878, three-fourths.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The bill to aid the resumption of specie payments, which I have introduced, follows the original idea, that the issue of legal-tender notes was a temporary war measure, not to be indefinitely protracted in time of peace.

The complex interests and the large stock of facts and figures surrounding, but not embellishing, financial questions deter most persons from giving them that full attention required for their just comprehension. It is also rare that any speaker on these dry questions can be so fortunate as to obtain a patient hearing even in the legislative bodies where they are to be determined, and which it may be sometimes a duty as well as a privilege to address. Having myself spoken early and late on these topics, the Senate may dread lest I am about to repeat some thrice-told tale; but although the subject is old, and although I cannot hope that it will borrow from me any fresh attractions, time has given to it some new phases, and I shall endeavor also neither to repeat myself, nor to abound in stale quotations from others.

It is hardly necessary for me to say that I am not an ardent lover of inconvertible paper money, but an inflexible supporter of a speedy return to specie payments, sincerely believing the dearest interests of our country imperatively require it, and I shall briefly indicate the policy which I am persuaded would aid that measure. Then I propose, while making such comments as the aspects of the various questions involved in resumption would seem to demand, to consider some of the objections, as well as some of the competitive propositions, which have been presented here and elsewhere; including among the awkward squad of alternatives, if I may be pardoned for calling them so, that of the overthrow of the national banks.

MEASURE PROPOSED.

The 1st of January, 1879, is the time fixed by law, and none too early, for a resumption of specie payments. This law, it will be granted, will not be repealed; but it can be disencumbered of some objections and have freer sailing by such supplemental legislation as will allow us to meet resumption by gradual approaches, or somewhat by anticipation. As the law now stands, the Secretary of the Treasury may possibly be compelled to exchange United States bonds for gold with which to redeem the outstanding circulation of United States notes. Instead of doing this, it would appear to be better and far cheaper—much less likely to derange the money market—to sell or exchange 4 or 4½ per cent. bonds, running thirty years or more, for the legal-tender notes, redeeming them as it was originally proposed to redeem them; by which process of returning to specie payments we shall gain rather than lose, as these notes would be more readily obtainable and at cheaper rates than gold. If we should allow this to be done, the currency would gradually approach to that volume required by the wants of trade and of specie resumption. Nor do we need to be compelled to keep in circulation any fixed amount of legal-tenders at par with specie. This would throw upon the Government the whole duty and cost of maintaining specie payments, which ultimately must mainly belong to the national banks, and this duty, it is fairly to be presumed, unless the banks mean to commit suicide, they will cheerfully assume and prepare for just so soon as the Government no longer seeks to crowd gold out of the country by maintaining in its place United States notes.

By the 1st of January, 1878, it may fairly be anticipated that the difference between the value of paper money and gold will be much less than what now prevails. Therefore something in the direction of the suggestion in the President's message may be properly adopted as the forerunner of actual specie resumption, or to provide that contracts after January, 1878, shall be upon a specie basis unless otherwise provided. This would accustom and educate our people to the coming change, bring more specie into actual circulation, and leave all those who may prefer to adhere to paper currency until the last moment at full liberty to do so. All parties would be entirely safe on this basis to buy and sell on the standard of coin or paper as they might choose, and the advantage is that it would serve not only as a warning, but to make less abrupt the approach of the paper currency to the par of specie.

There is a section of the bill offered by me which provides that the national banks shall hold a share of their reserve in coin, to the amount, in addition to what they already hold, of about the sum they will receive for interest upon their bonds between now and the 1st of January, 1879, or in all $75,000,000. This would be the prudent course for the banks, and to some extent diminish the sudden demand upon the Treasury of the United States which might otherwise be apprehended. The legal-tenders added to the volume of currency in circulation would most likely be quickly funded.

The late war ended without obliterating any of the ancient liberties of the people, and with the acquirement of liberty by a large and unfortunate class to whom it was before unknown, but to whom, as it had been foreseen by the framers of our Government, it could not forever be denied. There is now remaining no foundation for sectional prejudice, or for any antagonism of races, to perpetuate discord in the councils of the nation. All portions of our land, even that so fearfully scarred by the recent wounds of hostile armies, bring forth their wonted products in greater abundance than in the most fruitful of former seasons. Our relations with the world are altogether peaceful, and we need not be embarrassed in our course onward by anything save the labor of reaching just and wise conclusions upon the ordinary subjects of legislation, where for the most part our path has been illuminated by the wisdom and experience of centuries.

We have but to remember that we are to-day the custodians of the destiny of a great people, in whose prosperity, honor, and life we all hold an equal interest, and which must be preserved whatever may become of us individually, or whatever may be the fate of parties with which we are most in sympathy. We feel some pride, as the greatest off-shoot of the Anglo-Saxon race, covering a mighty empire, in our rank among nations, and cannot afford to impeach our own intelligence, nor to create a suspicion as to our ability or integrity; but if we are to seek financial refuge solely in a paper currency, and make the voyage of life upon that frail craft where every crew that has hitherto embarked has been speedily shipwrecked, the "model republic" will be known to have lost its ancient guidance of far-sighted and sure-footed statesmen. The names of Hamilton and Jefferson, of Webster and Benton, will hardly be allowed to twinkle in the presence of the burning and shining lights of the more flexible paper-money financiers. However earnestly our position of to-day merits attention, we cannot, as national legislators bound to look ahead, wholly keep out of view the position we may occupy in the immediate future relative to other nations. Great Britain has now a population of 31,857,000, and by her rate of increase, if the sea-girt islands can bear a greater density, should double in fifty years, when they would have a population of 63,714,000. But the United States, unconfined by any possible lack of territory, doubles its population in half of the time, or in about twenty-five years, and consequently our numbers in fifty years from 1870 ought to be 154,000,000 of people. The great loss of young men during the war may, however, require a few years more to make this estimate entirely reliable.

The population of Germany and of Italy doubles much more slowly and that of France in hardly less than one hundred and thirty-five years. It follows that the weight of our numbers, the activity and ambition of our people, and our geographical position, if not prophetic of a preponderance over all the leading powers, will certainly, and that very shortly, bring us at least into the foremost rank among all the nations of the earth.

How should we appear in commerce and the arts, in literature and science, in peace or in war, clinging to what we call money that is utterly destitute of any intrinsic value, and hugging the delusion that an inconvertible currency is a blessing to a people neither insane nor savage? Paper money not exchangeable for specie at the will of the holder has no right to exist. It is a pretender, disowned by commerce and shunned by solvent States. Valueless in itself, it is also a sham as a substitute. The proudest point in the character of a strong and vigorous nation should be its public credit, the chasteness of its honor—tolerating no fraudulent devices among its own citizens, nor winking at any in their intercourse with foreigners—and then its people may well labor for absolute independence, knowing that freedom from debt is even more essential to the independence of nations than of individuals, and also knowing that wealth is only created by labor. So long as the currency in daily circulation proclaims the fact that we do not pay our debts, and shows no evidence that we ever mean to pay them, we shall continue to dwindle in business energy as well as to sink in moral tone. Our national greatness will be greatness at a discount—having inflated pretensions, which serve only to display littleness—and however promising our start for a grand career, yet suddenly baffled by a paper-money monomania destructive to growth and confidence at home as well as respect abroad.

3.65 INTERCONVERTIBLE BONDS.

There are some persons who persist in harping upon a redemption of greenbacks with an interconvertible 3.65 per cent. interest-bearing bond, reconvertible into greenbacks at the will of the holder. "Pay your money and you can take your choice," and, as the inquirer was told about the two roads of equal length, "take whichever you please and you will be incontrovertibly sorry you had not taken the other." This is a scheme whose paternity has been claimed by several fathers—rather badly fixing the maternal character—by which the Government is to take all it can get of the temporary floating capital of the country and pay interest thereon until called for, and for which the Government can have no use whatever, but must idly hold in instant readiness all of either sort of paper to redeem the other. The interest to be paid would be a total loss to the Government, with no possible benefit, as the revenues of the Government accrue as fast as they are needed to pay out, and whatever is paid out is not loaned but when paid out is gone forever. The scheme appears wholly unsusceptible of any public or private advantage, unless there is an ulterior purpose to allow the Government to loan out the deposits of greenbacks and become the great banking-house of the country, so as to recover the amount of interest which it becomes liable to pay upon the issue of 3.65 per cent. bonds. Whether such a banking-house, managed by inflation financiers, would husband or squander their resources, we hardly need to wait for any experiment to disclose. If the Government were to offer to take and keep all the horses thrown out of employment at the commencement of winter, promising to return them sleek and fat in the spring, it would exhibit precisely the same sort of economic science that has been so persistently thrust forward by the interchangeable bond and greenback theorists.

It has been attempted to sugar-coat this interconvertible scheme by calling it a self-regulating system, one that can be set agoing much as an inflation orator does his tongue, and then, going away, leave it accountable to nobody; but a balloon, sent aloft without ballast and without human control, the sport of the winds, might be expected to furnish an equally admirable self-regulating system. Instead of extricating us from the present evils of a depreciated paper currency, this scheme, the great double-ender of inflation, would manifestly plunge us into deeper and wilder extravagancies. It is more than likely that the 3.65 per cent. bonds would circulate as currency as well before as after conversion into greenbacks, and for the purposes of inflation would amount to just what United States legal-tender notes would be if they bore 3.65 per cent. interest.

A further and insuperable objection to 3.65 per cent. exchangeable bonds is that they would start by the issue of slippery bonds worth in our markets, as bonds pure and simple, no more than from sixty-seven to seventy cents currency, instead of one hundred cents on the dollar. This is abundantly proven by the market rates of the bonds of the District of Columbia, with the interest guaranteed on their face by the Government of the United States, which have been hawked about the country, among not over-eager buyers, at sixty-eight cents and less, in a paper currency worth but eighty-six cents on the dollar, which is less for the bonds than 60 per cent. of their face value upon a gold standard. We could force the contractors and other creditors of the District of Columbia, as their last resort, to accept of such bonds, but can we in time of peace obtain a voluntary loan on such securities? Any new series of bonds set afloat at the low figure indicated would depress the value of all other bonds and greatly tend to the subversion of the public credit. By reducing the value of the only thing with which it is proposed ever to redeem the legal-tender notes, we should at the same moment depreciate the value also of legal-tender notes to the lowest level of the never-to-be-paid slippery 3.65 per cent. bonds.

It is very arrogantly claimed that this wonderful scheme would reduce the rate of interest to the borrower; but men who are able to own bonds of any sort rarely want to borrow money. Obviously the only mode of reducing the current rate of interest is by an increase of loanable capital or by lessening the demand for it. The Government can hardly be supposed, while it is one of the neediest and largest borrowers in the world at 5 per cent. interest, to have any genuine capital to loan at 3.65 per cent. Money with some blemish, or a little rickety, might be so obtained for an indefinite length of time, but not sound cash. Under such circumstances to issue promises to pay interest on the principal of debts never intended to be paid, except by the issue of another equal debt without interest, and style the latter a legal-tender, is a double-faced romance, a legal fiction of most melancholy proportions. If interest were to be paid, where and by whom can it be paid? By indorsement or by coupons? There are some practical difficulties about this scheme that financiers of "quick conception and easy delivery" do not seem to have considered.

But it is claimed that this mysterious interchangeability is to benefit poor people, who now make their deposits, to the extent of several hundred millions, in savings-banks, where they obtain 5 per cent., often 6 per cent., for the use of their surplus earnings, and all these, it is claimed, might be had and held under lock and key by the Government at the much lower rate of 3.65 per cent. Should this turn out to be true, would it not be a robbery of the poor to the extent of 1.35 per cent. of all the interest they now receive on their deposits? And yet this is the way some silver-tongued orators propose to benefit the poor; that is to say, by robbing them of more than one-quarter part of the interest they now receive! The claim as to reducing the rate of interest to temporary borrowers is equally unfounded. Temporary loans, or loans on call, are made upon a pledge of unquestioned securities, with an ample margin, and then frequently made at 3 or even 2 per cent. interest, which is lower than it is proposed the Government should offer loans. An unsound theory often discloses, even upon a cursory examination, many of its faults; but practical experience is sure to bring many more to light, and the unsoundness of the interconvertible bond and greenback theory, of conversion that will not stay converted, is too visible to require any further illustration. It was dead when born.

CUSTOMS DUTIES IN PAPER.

One of the most aspiring financial propositions yet broached cannot be wholly overlooked, and I refer to that which proposes that all duties on foreign goods, now paid in coin, may hereafter be paid in paper money, which would virtually repeal the old established democratic doctrine that all duties on imports shall be paid in cash, as well as the later law of 1862, containing the pledge that such duties shall be paid in gold and set apart to pay the public debt.

Singularly enough, this is smilingly regarded by a few who are willing to wound but not ready to strike the tariff, as well as by those who have wholly cut loose from coin, determined to sink or swim with paper money alone, and also by six or seven honest men who really feel, if we show how much we despise gold and how little we care for it at the custom-house, that everybody will adopt the same opinion, and that gold will then at once drop so low in value that all who have it will be in haste to exchange it for paper. With much gravity they even claim this as the swiftest mode of returning to specie payments. By our flattering declaration that black is white, we are to make silly bullionists, following the example of the crow in the fable, drop their gold, and then, like Æsop's fox, we are to stand ready to snatch it up. If these honest men are not mistaken, here is to be found a real resumptive boomerang, which, though sent off in an opposite direction, is to whirl round and at last smite the rocks, from which will pour a flood of the precious metals. I confess to an entire want of faith in the boomerang movement.

When our books were opened round the world to obtain subscriptions for bonds and notes, we made a pledge that our revenues from duties on foreign goods should be collected in coin and dedicated to the payment of the interest upon the public debt, with 1 per cent. each year set apart as a sinking fund. This was done for a double purpose: first, to insure stability to the rates of duty prescribed by law; second, to offer the greatest elements of strength to our public credit. Thus far it has supported the ends for which it was designed. If it was needful in war it is almost equally so in peace. Such pledges, when violated by weak nations, as not very long since by Mexico, have sometimes been sternly enforced by the superior power of other governments, whose citizens had become interested as creditors. Texas, prior to annexation, had contracted debts for which she pledged her tariff revenues, and the United States was notified, pending annexation, that we should be held responsible to pay the Texas debts; and we did pay them. Any clamor of foreign creditors, even with intervention looming up in the background, we might possibly feel a bullying propensity to ignore, but we could not brave our own loss of self-respect, nor the crushing weight of the judgment of mankind, that would surely follow any infraction of the nation's plighted faith.

Let me recite precisely what we have solemnly declared should be done if the world would only trust us. By the act of Congress, approved by the President, of February 25, 1862, it was proclaimed that all duties on imported goods should be paid in coin, and then that the coin "so paid shall be set apart as a special fund, and shall be applied as follows:"

First. To the payment in coin of the interest on the bonds and notes of the United States.

Second. To the purchase or payment of 1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States, to be made within each year, which is to be set apart as a sinking fund, and the interest of which shall in like manner be applied to the purchase or payment of the public debt, as the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time direct.

Third. The residue to be paid into the Treasury.

Is it possible to select language more explicit? A similar pledge of the public faith decorates several pages of our public statutes. To change this pledge by the ninth part of a hair would be to unbar the gates leading to repudiation. But, it may be asked, are these provisions to last forever? Certainly, they must be maintained until the uttermost farthing of the debts contracted under such terms shall have been extinguished, and it includes both bonds and legal-tender notes. Nor is it any hardship. It is not only honest, but politic. It is the sole ballast of the ship with crowded sails. We cannot with much grace get onto our knees in a storm, and then, when the winds are hushed, take the defiant attitude of an infidel backslider. Our honor, if not our religion, is at stake.

But if there were no sacred obligations to fulfill, it would, as it appears to me, be extreme folly to change the law. It is as essential now to have a stable tariff as it has ever been, and the payment of any part of the duties on foreign goods in depreciated paper would subject such duties to the daily fluctuations in the value of depreciated paper. Beyond this, it would be a sweeping, blindfold reduction of the rate of duties to just the extent of the difference between the value of paper money and coin, with a tantamount loss of revenue, at a time when we ought to have more instead of less, if we are in earnest about a resumption of specie payments. The depressed condition of manufactures throughout the world also more than ever makes it a duty to shield our own industry from exceptional competition. A prosperous condition of the industry of the country is what is most sought by a return to specie payments, and this ought not to be checked at the outset by a measure that would affect it adversely. It is to be presumed that when honorable Senators choose to propose a reduction of duties they will not be content with a flank attack, but will present direct and frank propositions.

More than half of the two hundred millions or more of specie in the country is retained here and kept in motion by the payment of duties on foreign importations, and the remainder is either hoarded or in circulation. To give importers the option of paying duties in paper or coin would be such an advantage as would at once banish from the country our present stock of gold. It would be sold here only for whatever it might be worth to send abroad, and having no available value here, when the time for resumption arrives there would be a contraction, and a contraction of our resources instead of our liabilities.

It is not possible to keep out of mind the fact that by law we have undertaken to resume specie payments three years hence, and that we shall then want coin to redeem our outstanding United States notes. Common sense would seem to point out the necessity of providing resources for that purpose; but instead it is proposed, as we have seen, to refuse all coin for revenue, and then be forced into the market to buy not only whatever coin may be required to redeem our legal-tender notes, but to pay the interest on bonds and to sustain the sinking fund. When we shall presently need a large surplus of coin, it is proposed to have none whatever. Of course all this would result in an ignominious failure to fulfill our obligations. Perhaps some of those who would favor this interference with the customs revenue might not revolt at such a result. I cannot believe, however, that any considerable number of our people would fail to scorn so great a departure from all sound principles and of so flagrant a violation of public faith.

NON-EXPORTABLE MONEY.

It has been promulgated in some unexpected quarters that we must not only keep and maintain a volume of currency equal to the wants of trade, but that it must be "a non-exportable currency." This new-fangled word is as unsupportable as the doctrine it is intended to gloss, or as would be the analogous term non-importable. It is doubtless intended to describe a currency which shall neither go nor be smuggled out of the country, and it is very properly assumed that paper money, divorced from specie and subject to a heavy discount, fulfills this requirement, or will fulfill it by such additional inflation as the fluctuating wants of trade from time to time may prompt.

If such paper was worth anything to export, it is obvious that all laws to prevent its exportation would be practically nugatory. This catch-word, therefore, means some quality inherent in the kind of currency to be maintained which is to make or keep it as forbidden fruit to the touch of foreigners, so worthless that nobody will take it but ourselves, or so tainted as to provoke its exclusion by sanitary measures from all healthy ports abroad; or possibly, as a matter of strict ethics, it is to be held that gold, being the root of all evil, profane and unclean, shall be wholly excluded from our own country, where it is produced in the greatest abundance, in order that it may enrich and curse those who know no better than to handle and covet this glittering "relic of barbarism," while we grow lean and happy in the supremacy of a "non-exportable" and irredeemable paper currency equal to all the ups and downs of trade.

Whether this non-exportable currency shall be kept at home by its virtues or its vices, our gold and our bonds will be sure to quit the country. The difficulty of making gold "non-exportable" will continue to puzzle even a "Philadelphia lawyer," and it is not to be wondered at that the difficulty has been recognized. But for home use we are to prop up paper money by the imagination, by the evidence of things not seen, no matter if a faithless world looks on and laughs, and whatever paper bears the governmental stamp of a dollar is to be a dollar, a non-exportable dollar, to all intents and purposes, and is on no account to gad abroad. Foreigners who come here to buy a cargo of wheat must first exchange their gold for a cargo of "non-exportable currency," and then they will have secured a lawful tender for all American products. We are to be gold-proof, and forever renounce gold, because it is exportable. However abundant depreciated paper may be, there is no danger of its escape, nor of any demand for it abroad; a prejudice rather exists against it. Some people are supposed to derive as much satisfaction in staring at the pictorial showbills of a menagerie as in viewing the menagerie itself. To all such, it may be presumed, the "non-exportable" paper pictures are good enough, and anything more would involve useless expense, to be indulged in only by bullionists or by the only animal ever known to have spoken; but the homely common-sense of our people has not yet been wholly weaned from the sight of the precious metals, and of all pictures they prefer "gold in pictures of silver."

It is not enough, it seems, that our present paper currency is almost non-ponderous, often non est inventus, and always non-redeemable, but it must be "non-exportable!" It might be suspected, perhaps, that this invention was hatched out as a sly satire on the doctrine of protection, but its simplicity and solemn absurdity forbid the idea of any joke. The statesmanship exhibited must be credited to American and not to Oriental genius, because it is a bold attempt, not indeed to shut out an invasion of the Tartars, but to shut out an invasion of foreign coal and pig-iron—worse, I admit, than that of Tartars—by offering nothing as pay that can be carried away. Who is really entitled to the honors of this great discovery is disputable; but like the discovery of some of the planets, or of electric telegraphy and of photography, it seems to have been simultaneously hit upon by several learned investigators of economic science, all alike amazed that the world had not found out before that paper was lighter, more stable in value than gold, and, to cap the climax, was "non-exportable." Whoever was ahead in this great discovery, the others will not be content to stay behind, and the honor may be possibly great enough for all even when subdivided.

Can it be argued by sane expounders of political economy that a "non-exportable currency" would be the equivalent of a Chinese wall to restrain, or to stop altogether, the invasion of foreign importations? Ten years and more have afforded a pretty effectual trial of any paper-wall theory, and the result does not support the conceit but quite the reverse. Our importations of foreign merchandise, since the introduction of legal-tender paper money, have been of unexampled magnitude. Notwithstanding our large exports of cotton, petroleum, wheat, corn, and tobacco, the balance of trade has been generally largely against us. Even with our rich product of gold and silver added, exceeding, as it does, that of any other country, we still often fail to square the account, and the consequent increase of our foreign indebtedness now exceeds all former examples in our history. This is the foretaste we have already had of a "non-exportable currency;" and yet it is gravely proposed that for all coming time we shall have nothing else for our national diet! We are to teach the world a grander policy—how to deposit the precious metals in the "tomb of exploded traditions," and to live without labor and without taxes, by the issue of paper money equal to the wants of everybody, equal to the wants of trade!

Ten years ago it was thought to have been a great achievement when by treaty four governments of Europe, all having a decimal coinage based upon the franc, formed a "monetary union," by which their moneys should circulate and be a legal tender in France, Italy, Belgium, and Switzerland. Common money was thought to be better than alien coinage. The theory of a non-exportable currency evidently had not been heard of in Europe, and its prophets must now be content with such honor as they find in their own country, and when found it will most assuredly be non-exportable.

If it had been possible it might have been well to have had non-exportable bonds, but the sovereignty of paper money here threw them into the hands of foreigners upon more advantageous terms than were open to our own people, who are even now exposed, if they make any investments in bonds, to be flatteringly remembered as "bloated bondholders," worthy of crucifixion. Owning no bonds myself, and never expecting to own any, I yet should be glad to have Americans hold them all.

WAITING FOR THE COUNTRY TO GROW.

Not unfrequently it has been argued, especially by those who seem unaccountably blind to the fact that there is never any standing room on the top rail of the fence, that our only remedy for a currency largely inflated and below par is to wait and let the country grow up to it. The philosopher who waited on the banks for the river to run by was hardly more profound or patient. Our experience when the panic of 1873 caused an out-rush of $26,000,000 of currency, and later when a large share of the reserve of the banks was unloosed, shows that the growth of the country, great as it may be, will not overtake the more prolific growth of a paper currency—growing if the country prospers, but growing most if it does not prosper—and in such a race the country will always be hopelessly distanced.

Singularly enough, however, this sedentary waiting idea is one of the most plausible opinions, amounting to no opinion, which has ever found respectable backers, and, when sustained on the argument that Congress will never apply any other remedy, if that has any basis of truth, then Congress, rather than those who anchor to this argument, most deserves criticism; but if the idea is put forth as the best and only solution of the evils involved in a redundant paper currency, it may be proper to give it some examination, as there are many, like

Hudibras, who have much wit but are shy of using it, and who therefore more readily adopt the stolid advice to stand still than any which costs a greater effort to follow. They trust the Spanish motto, "Time and I, gentlemen, against any two."

The recommendation of the policy of indefinite waiting for the growth of the country to overtake the volume of currency now afloat is simply a recommendation of non-action, and commits our escape from the present degraded condition of our monetary affairs to all the perturbations of time and chance, to the fluctuations of political parties and the vicissitudes of trade, and at last to other and more virtuous generations, if such, through natural selection of the fittest, ever come forth. The adherents of this financial gospel, like the Laodiceans, seem to be neither cold nor hot, and in great danger of being spewed out.

But the first question that naturally arises is, how long is the very shortest period we must wait for the country to grow up to the present amount of paper currency? There is no way, it has been well said, to judge of the future but by the past. The bank or paper circulation in 1860, with a population of 31,429,891, was $207,802,000, and at no time had been more than five millions above that sum. For all the wants of trade $6.58 per capita appears to have been enough. It was not then dreamed that there was any deficiency, and, if there had been, it was only necessary to ask for more to get it; but no more was asked for. If the amount of paper money then was sufficient for our normal condition, the amount we now have is evidently vastly too much. Our population in 1870 was 38,555,983, and the amount of legal-tender and national-bank notes in August, 1875, was $767,533,323. Assuming the standard of 1860 and of years prior thereto as equal to the fair requirements of financial health and stability—with the country no larger, unless made larger by the ice of Alaska—we have now such an excess of currency that, if we wait until the country grows up to it, we must postpone specie resumption until our population rises to 116,646,401, with a corresponding increase of the wants of trade! This illustrates the grand expansion for which it has been proposed to wait, and for which the only preparation needed would be to have those who wait properly embalmed by the undertaker. Will it not test the endurance of the sedentary financiers a little too long? They seek to alarm us by affirming that we shall surely sink by any contraction of the bladder which buoys us up, but can they not perceive that the danger is equally great if the dimensions of the body to be supported are with equal pace allowed to expand?

In the present calculations the probable amount of gold in the country in 1860 and at the present time is hardly a factor to be considered, as the difference is not great, and a proportionate amount, probably more, will inevitably return to the country whenever and as rapidly as it may be wanted. We have for nearly fifteen years treated gold as a relic of barbarism, just as it must be treated in a paper age, and our whole product since 1850 is gone; the commercial nations of the world are gorged with it; and the moment we begin to appreciate it, that moment in will return to stay, and we shall begin to hold a reasonable share of what we produce.

It may be claimed that we are now doing more business according to the ratio of population than we were doing in 1860. Before the panic of 1873 this might have been true, though not since; but it is also true that less general credit is now conceded in business affairs, and this, with the present mode of making payments, largely diminishes the amount of currency required. Less, instead of more, does the work. In all the chief business places bank-checks are used instead of currency in the payment of bills and accounts. Only petty purchases are made with bank-notes. All persons having a bank account issue more or less of their own circulating medium.

The national banks, savings-banks, and private banking-houses are so much more numerous now than they were formerly that their aggregate deposits make a greater figure than all the paper money of the country, and they are actively employed. Business men, after depositing their funds in banks, for all disbursements, issue checks, which are practically more serviceable than bank-bills or legal-tender notes. They are payable to order, exact in amount, and hasten the dispatch of business. The amount of checks, certificates of deposit, drafts, and bills of exchange in daily circulation is enormous. Wherever banks are established, no more than from 6 to 8 per cent., often no more than from 3 to 5 per cent., of business transactions are adjusted by the use of currency. Except for the small retail trades, checks supply the place of money for the greatest part of all daily settlements. This method of doing business, though by no means new, has more recently been so rapidly and widely extended, in connection with clearing-houses, as to supersede in a large measure the necessity of keeping and paying out currency. But the system of postal orders and of transfers by telegraph is entirely new, and figures largely also as a substitute for money. If we are doing more business now in proportion to population, far less currency is called for, with our present facilities and habits, than was very recently supposed to be indispensable. The conclusion is inevitable, as it appears to me, that less currency is now really needed in proportion to population or to business than what was required fifteen years ago. The methods of business have not grown clumsy, but more facile.

Moreover, if we were to wait all the days of our appointed time, there is the constant peril, while the appetite is growing upon what it feeds, of the exigencies of parties, or of the accidental preponderance of majorities, which may lead us into deeper mire instead of out. Every panic which overtakes the business of the country brings forth a brood of financial doctors, who, to cure inflation, prescribe a little more inflation, similia similibus curantur, which means, I believe, that a hair of the same beast cures. Homeopathic remedies may be excellent, but I protest against their financial application. The goal of specie payments will not be attained in this way. There should be no waiting for a generation to pass away and for another to come with more ability and courage than we ascribe to ourselves or than must be ascribed to our forefathers in every similar crisis. Those who never start are most unlikely ever to reach the end of the journey.

DEBTORS.

It is fair to consider the injury, if any, which might fall upon debtors by raising the value of the paper dollar to the par of specie. Because debts incurred on a gold basis were once paid on a paper basis, those who contend for "honest money" cannot afford to cover up any wrong which is likely to ensue from the policy they advocate. Supposing that some injustice may be inevitable, it should not be forgotten that the remaining step to the par of gold cannot be so great as occurred in each one of four successive months—January, February, March, and April—of 1865, and often before and since, when the value of paper money suffered violent changes. The recurrence of these changes cannot be avoided so long as an exclusive paper standard shall be maintained. It is this very evil which it is sought to avoid, and, if the remedy is bitter in the mouth, it is some consolation to know that it will have to be tasted but once instead of being presented to unwilling lips every day in the year.

But is it not at least doubtful whether debtors would suffer any injury or not? They might be compelled to pay debts in better money and yet at no greater cost. It is nearly certain that property would not generally shrink much in value by a return to the specie standard, and such a return, promising so much of permanence and solidity, might cause such a revival of business, such a restoration of confidence, as to even more than counterbalance any depression arising from the dismissal of a false legal-tender standard from the future financial records of the country. The entire earnings of industry, it cannot be doubted, would be far greater, and the liquidation of debts, therefore, would be made much more easily.

There is a great delusion prevailing as to the effect which either contraction or inflation would have upon the rich and the poor, as it is frequently assumed that contraction would benefit the rich and fall heavily upon the poor, while inflation would benefit the poor and deprive the rich of some undue advantages. It would be much nearer the truth to say the effect would be exactly the reverse. The rich and poor assumption is resorted to by those who pretend to have more tenderness than any others for debtors, and who strive to cultivate their prejudice and ignorance in order to curry favor and rule them long. But such would-be leaders are short lived, and inspire no respect for their memories, as they themselves have no respect for the true dignity of manhood. The wrath of debtors deceived subsides very slowly, and the deceivers, the elastic friends of an exclusively paper currency, will have a fearful account to settle with contemporaries as well as with posterity. Is it not manifest that most men of wealth own large masses of property which would be increased in nominal value by inflation and which would be subject to all the perils of contraction? Take, for example, the Astors of New York; they are free from debt and own acres of real estate covered with costly tenements. Contraction might shrink the valuation represented by their last inventory, as inflation might swell it and make them figuratively richer, but they would hold the same property and their riches would relatively stand untouched. What is true of them is true of most men of wealth in this country. Their chief assets are held in the form of real or personal property, debts excepted, and their income is derived from rentals and dividends. What, then, becomes of the cry of the inflationists against making the rich richer and the poor poorer? It is not only not true, but it is not even respectable clap-trap. Men destitute of property can suffer nothing as property-holders from its diminution in value, as they can gain nothing by inflation; but those who have property, with their good fortune, must bear its alcamities, bear contraction, if that should be a calamity. The strong swimmer with empty pockets reaches the shore, but those whose pockets are overloaded go down. Men destitute of property, however, labor for their living, and necessarily suffer most from fictitious values put upon property. They are the foremost victims of inflated prices or of the diminution of the purchasing power of money.

The credit system of the world during the present century has been greatly curtailed by the better habit of cash payments. Governments no longer give credit for duties on foreign importations; the farmer no longer mortgages his crops in advance for his yearly support; mechanics no longer give a long year's credit, but are paid at the end of every job. It is true that many importing merchants owe foreign debts, but they are all gold contracts, where inflation would be to the detriment of the debtors; and, besides, they have debts supposed to be equivalent in paper due to them from jobbers. Jobbers in turn have an equal amount due to them on short-time paper from retailers, who now sell nothing, or very little, on credit, and this credit is extended, not to the poor man, but to those able to respond on demand; in fact, very few workingmen ask or obtain more than one month's credit upon anything they buy, but they are almost uniformly in the habit of paying as they go or when they receive their monthly wages; otherwise they might not be able to get trusted, as non-payment is often accounted as evidence of idleness or of bad habits. How are any of these classes to be injured by the gradual approach of specie resumption whole years hence?

The savings of the workingman or his reserve funds for a wet day are usually in the form of a debt from some savings-bank, and, instead of being injured, he is to be the gainer by specie resumption. His dollar in the bank is to be a better dollar, and those who are much better off as to property will be compelled to bear the burden, if there is to be a burden. What now becomes of the cry about making the poor poorer by contraction? It is inflation which most pinches the poor man, because he alone never gets inflated.

To provide in advance—whatever might be done at the last moment—that all time contracts shall be adjusted according to the price of gold when the contract was made would prevent all requisite preparation for a return to specie payments; few would have their lamps trimmed and burning, and would be very likely to imperil the success of resumption. But with time and ample notice everybody will be ready, except the man who is always left behind.

All of our countrymen by the action of the last Congress will have had four years' notice that resumption of specie payments was to be brought about in 1879. Ever since that notice and now debtors have had some slight advantage in the liquidation of debts. Paper has drooped in value. The hostility of a class of exasperated statesmen has, perhaps, thrown some doubt over the practical realization of the measures of the last Congress, and this may have retarded that legitimate appreciation of paper money we are likely hereafter to more fully realize. No one can complain that ample notice has not been given; and, if there should be any who have entered upon bargains to be consummated years hence, it is to be presumed that they have been properly guarded, or that they proceeded on the gambler's calculation of the chances of profit rather than of loss. If they bleed, they will themselves have planted the thorns; but if they have been wise, and now patriotically stand up to the laws and the honor of their country, they will not bleed. I have thus arrived at the conclusion that the sum of the wrong to debtors from a resumption of specie payments will be very small—never to be any less; and, whatever it may amount to, it is inevitable not only to any resumption, but much more to the continued use of an exclusively paper currency, and that the universal compensation of a fixed measure of values must be regarded as fully covering any possible sacrifice.

INFLATION.

The injustice of inflation never seems to trouble the consciences of those who once get their eyes fixed upon it. There is a communistic idea possibly lurking around this banner that no wrong can be done to men of property, and, though their substance may have been acquired in the struggle of a log-cabin and pioneer life, or by long years of industry and economy, the owners are frequently visited by the frantic inflationists with all the outlawry of hatred. A different distribution, it may be, is what is really but vainly sought by inflation. But it is our glory to have institutions calculated to make poor men rich, not to make rich men poor—institutions which make no distinctions, treating all, however unequal in capacity or industry, as equal before the law; and our whole republican theory would tumble to the ground were we to make any distinction either of favor or disfavor to persons or classes. Fortunately most men in our country have some property, with more or less prospect of more, and many with only a small property have larger debts due to them than what they owe. The increase of individual deposits in national banks from 1870 to 1875 was $155,000,000, showing some prosperity, if not all we could wish. If it would be wrong to make men pay more than the contract when made was supposed to call for, as unquestionably it would be, it would be equally wrong to authorize them to pay less; and yet this is what is really sought to be done by that mysterious inflation which only professes to be equal to the wants of trade. The selfishness and greed of those who may be debtors, or able to become debtors, for a larger amount than is or will be due to them as creditors, are adroitly invoked in behalf of a cheap paper contrivance with which to pay debts, a contrivance equaled in beauty and surpassed in cheapness by the colored beads of Africa and the shells of the ancient Rhode Island savages.

Is it not the case of the unjust steward over again? "So he called every one of his lord's debtors unto him, and said unto the first, How much owest thou unto my lord? And he said, A hundred measures of oil. And he said unto him, Take thy bill, and sit down quickly, and write fifty." Whatever of popularity may be won in any quarter for inflation will be won from the limited number of those who chuckle with delight at the words, "Take thy bill, and sit down quickly, and write fifty." The propagandists of this doctrine, wiser than the children of light, cannot dig, to beg they are ashamed, and they have resolved what to do in order to have somebody receive them into their houses or to shelter them with an office; but they will be likely to find a hospitality as deficient as their own morality, and be met with the words, "Knock as you please; there is nobody at home."

THREE-FOURTHS NOT IN DEBT TO ONE-FOURTH.

There are some philanthropists who seem to rest their good name not upon charities or other good works, but upon fervidly proclaiming that the miseries of other people are worse than what they seem, and their generosity culminates in wordy overstatements about hard times, the extent of calamities, and the woes of universal poverty. Their history of the world is a catalogue of grievances offset by no blessings. The people would never know half their sorrows but for these swift witnesses; and our sluggish gratitude is overdue to one of these for the statement that three-fourths of our people are in debt to the other fourth, although the assertion is nothing more than a monstrous libel. If the author had added that he himself was never happy except when he was perfectly wretched, the story would have been more pathetic and the exaggeration perhaps no worse.

The American people, gauging their possessions upon the inflated standard of a depreciated currency, have no doubt indulged in a more lavish rate of expenditure than they could afford, but it is not true that they are generally in debt. They have only been getting rid of their paper money as fast as they got it, saving little. Those having more due to them than what they owe belong in fact to the creditor class. It would be far too much to admit that one in ten of the people owe more than they have due to them. While they may not have been as prudent and may not be as well off as they would have been but for their long endurance of an exclusive and depreciated paper currency, they are not relatively poor, and have no idea of becoming paupers, nor of asking for inflation with which to scale or cancel any honest debts. Nearly all of the farmers in the old and long-settled States own their farms, and many of them, beyond this, have a handsome surplus. Professional men have little occasion to contract debts; they obey the scriptural injunction, "owe no man anything," and all but those just starting in their career are free from debt. Mechanics and merchants almost invariably have more due to them than the amount standing against them. These mutual claims offset each other, and the indebtedness is only nominal which stands at ninety dollars debit against one hundred dollars credit.

Where there are large numbers of workmen employed in mines, or workshops, or factories, there are some who run in debt for their daily living and pay at the end of the month; but even here the majority give evidence of thrift, knowing that the "borrower is servant to the lender," and have on hand, or safely deposited in some savings-bank, the American antidote for pauperism, much more than a month's wages. In the new States great numbers have secured bounty lands and homesteads free, amounting to over one hundred million acres, without money and without price, and where any of these have bought additional acres, or have bought land of railroads or of speculators, to hold for tillage or for a rise in value, there is undoubtedly some indebtedness; but the prices paid, or agreed to be paid, have been so moderate that the rise in the lapse of time protects them, and one good crop on fertile prairies very often suffices to extinguish all indebtedness. Besides this, the price of all the crops raised for market by farmers is now regulated entirely by the gold price abroad, and it will not therefore be any injury to the owners to have what is consumed by themselves at home valued according to the gold standard. Flour, corn, and beef are no dearer now than they were on a coin basis in 1860, and it would be no disadvantage to the producers of flour, corn, and beef to have all other articles of consumption brought to the same level. To say that three-fourths of our people are in debt to the other fourth is as absurd as to assert that three out of every four are poor and "servants to the lender" because they do not wear their best clothes every day but put on a garb suitable to their work.

The country is largely in debt, it is true, but mainly for debts which must be paid in gold or its equivalent, whatever currency we may tolerate for domestic uses. That is to say, the national debt, some share of the debts of States, much of the bonded debts of railroads and of other large corporations, and all of the debts of importers of foreign merchandise, are payable absolutely upon the coin standard. Honor and good faith require this no less than the terms of the contracts. We cannot avoid the gold standard if we would. Legislation can no more abolish it than it can abolish the equator. Nor is the hardship unendurable, because it was foreseen and predestinated. The old standard of gold duties on all imports was pledged for the extinguishment of our national debt; this was a condition-precedent; and all we now receive for our exports, amounting annually to between five and six hundred million dollars, is paid to us in coin or its equivalent. Individual indebtedness, whatever its amount may be, in view of a fixed period for resumption, will mainly mature in advance and be rapidly extinguished, but with any glimmering prospect of a continued or increased debasement of the currency all such indebtedness will be indefinitely expanded by all the motive power of selfishness among a people already too much demoralized by paper money. However heavily non-personal debts may press upon us, we cannot throw off the burden by any fanatical denunciation of the inherent value of gold—which is not only a measure of value but is value itself—nor by any shallow pretense that of the two paper is the most precious and the last to be parted with. Any and all of these subterfuges point to nothing less discreditable than ultimate repudiation, and cannot be accepted by any who are not prepared to bid farewell to all the character for virtue and verity our fathers lived and died to obtain.

The loud averment that three out of four of our people are in debt is a very harmless scarecrow, in the face of the fact that the amount of individual deposits in the national banks is $664,000,000, and the amount of such deposits with banks and bankers other than national is $1,346,000,000, making a total of $2,010,000,000, or almost enough of deposits—and very largely the deposits of workingmen and working-women—to pay off the whole of our national debt. If there are any people who can make a better exhibit, where there are more standing midway between wealth and poverty, they have yet to be heard from.

NATIONAL BANKS.

It is often declared—generally by those who jump at conclusions or by partisans who echo caucus-made resolutions—that the national banks should be abolished, or that the currency issued by them should be withdrawn and an equal amount should be issued by the Government of the United States. The argument for this change is, that if there is any profit in the circulation the Government may as well monopolize it as to allow it to remain with the banks. It is roundly asserted that the Government pays them $20,000,000 annually for issuing notes which in case of failure the Government must redeem. Of course all this is a perverse misstatement of the facts, and, though a thousand times refuted, must be again and again refuted. Up to this time the failed banks have deposited over a million dollars in excess of the amount redeemed by the Government. Not one of them is in default.

Let it be ever borne in mind that there is no attribute of the National Government or of the State governments which can be safely trusted with any branch of banking business. Governments may grant the power to corporations or to individuals for banking purposes, and impose taxes, as well as other salutary restrictions, upon them, but they have no more apt functions for the management of banking business than for mining or manufacturing enterprises.

But let us examine the possible loss of the banks, or the possible profits to be gained by the United States by transferring to the latter the issue of $347,900,082, that being the amount of the national-bank currency. Of this sum, the banks were required to hold in lawful money, on the 1st of October, 1875, as a reserve, $151,000,000, and they actually held more, or $234,000,000; but, deducting the reserve of paper money or gold which by law they were required to hold and could not use, there could not have been an actual profit on their own circulation upon any greater sum than $196,000,000. The interest upon this sum—being the gain or loss—is easily computed. The Government now obtains money at 5 per cent., and therefore the possible gain by depriving the banks of circulation and issuing legal-tenders instead would be less than $10,000,000; but even this sum must be further reduced by the amount of taxes imposed upon the national banks, which in 1875 amounted to $7,260,758, and the net gain of seizing the profits of the national-bank circulation would foot up only $2,500,000, while the indirect loss in the support given by the national banks to the credit of the Government would be serious and far more than counterbalance this inconsiderable saving. From 1864 to July 1, 1875, the amount of taxes collected by the United States Treasurer of the national banks was $75,841,353. So much they have actually paid for banking privileges. The large amount of additional taxes imposed by the States and paid by the banks have yet to be considered. In the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, December, 1874, I find this statement:

> The average amount of taxation assessed upon the capital of the national banks of the country is estimated at from 3 to 3½ per cent. Real estate and personal property generally are assessed at not more than one-third of their value, but bank shares are usually assessed at their full value, and there is no doubt that the ratio of taxation of the national banks is greater than that of any other species of property.

Accepting this statement, based upon very full returns, as moderate and just, it shows that the States are receiving probably more taxes from the national banks than they would receive had they been chartered by State authority, or at least 3 per cent. on a gross capital of $504,829,769, amounting annually to $15,144,893. It would be thoroughly bad policy, as all must admit, to compel the States to forego so large an item of revenue without any equivalent or even the smallest advantage to the National Government.

The profits of the national banks are not derived so much from their circulation as from their deposits, amounting to $664,579,619, which are much larger than all of their capital, and nearly twice as much as their circulation.

A gross error has been propagated about the liability of the Government to redeem the notes of defaulting banks. Any bank which fails must already have deposited ample securities in the form of bonds with the Government for the redemption of its outstanding circulation, and the Government, paying nothing itself, merely acts as the agent of the bank in summarily disposing of the bonds in sufficient amount to redeem the notes of the bank. This is the whole extent of the liability of the Government; but the share-holders, in their individual capacity, are still further holden for all debts of the bank to the extent of the par value of their stock in addition to the amount of their shares. The public, beyond all peradventure, is secure, but wholly without exposing the Government to any expense or to the slightest risk, except that arising from paying out moneys previously received in trust.

Originally I did not favor the destruction of the State banks, nor the establishment of the national banks on their ruins. It seemed to be a great and sudden change of interests, deeply imbedded in every State, at a time when our people were being tried by the severest tests; and I only yielded my own views after an assurance from very high authority that our bonds could not be disposed of and their credit maintained without the active co-operation of all the banking capital of the country. This perhaps enables me to look upon the questions involved with something of impartiality; and while the legal-tender notes, so easily invited and so hard to be dismissed, have proved rather worse hangers-on than was anticipated even when all manner of evil had been predicted, I must also confess that the national banks have turned out on the whole better than was over expected, and if they were now circulating a currency convertible at par into specie nearly all of their defects would vanish.

If there can be a better banking system devised I should be glad to see it, and certainly shall not have any difficulty in properly estimating the merits of any plan which may be offered as a substitute. It is easy to suggest change, but not always so easy to suggest anything better. One of the chronic evils we have to endure at home, and the one most criticised abroad, is the inconstancy of American legislation and the consequent perplexing fear of change. Parties feel bound to signalize their accession to power by carrying out some cunning novelty of the latest party platform as the potent medicine for all political complaints. Among all parties we have those who behold in every whirling change captivating reform, and they are so giddy with some expected fame as reformers, that they cannot stand upright unless, like a top, they keep turning round. It follows from this lack of adherence to any permanent policy that the business interests of the country have no tranquil time when they can take root. The eagerness of parties to trample upon everything which has been done by their opponents overmasters all other policy, and the ambition of bustling leaders, painfully laboring to give birth to something which they can claim as their own, tends to make them reckless as to whether the new measure will really prove good or bad, provided they can at once be credited with its paternity. They love a monster baby better than sterility.

Because the United States Bank, with a capital of only $50,000,000, was uprooted, or because the suspended State banks were uprooted, it does not follow that it would be wise to uproot the much more numerous national banks, and that long before we have placed them where they might be able to do their best, nor does it follow that the uprooting process could be continued with the former facility, and with no greater strain upon the country. The capital involved may be scouted by demagogues, and I owe it very little reverence, but it is part of the property of the country, and the business interests at stake are not unworthy of some consideration by legislators. The cry of "down with the banks" by the financial doctors might "kill more patients than they have cases."

It will not cheapen capital nor money to destroy a part of it, and a change of the $980,000,000 loan account of the banks to new parties would be attended by a severe struggle, and to both debtors and creditors would be productive of a greater or less sacrifice. The old institutions would have to be wound up in order to surrender the field to new occupants. Their debtors would be called upon to meet their debts at once, and their bonds would be forced upon markets from whence they are now wholly withdrawn. We have passed through the ordeal of getting rid of the State banks, and, being rid of them, it will be proper to seriously consider whether or not anything can be gained by their restoration. Thirty-seven distinct systems of State banking, all with a circulation of unequal value, and none at par except within their own limited precincts, would not at the outset offer a favorable comparison with our present system. The jargon of exchanges would be unendurable. The petty discounts on the currency of the State banks to which we were formerly everywhere subjected, amounting in the annual aggregate to many millions, does not very strongly urge their re-establishment.

Our people were invited to invest their capital in Government bonds with which to establish a permanent system of national banks, and many of these bonds for this purpose have been paid for and are now in the custody of the Government, permanently taken out of the market, to secure the public against loss on account of any failure on the part of the banks to redeem their circulating notes. They started upon the terms offered, pushed by all the strongest arguments of the Government, and a public pledge, through the solemn enactment of Congress, was given to each bank (see section 5736 of the Revised Laws) that it should "have succession from the period of twenty years from its organization, unless it is sooner dissolved according to the provisions of its articles of association or by the acts of its shareholders owning two-thirds of its stock, or unless its franchise become forfeited by some violation of law." Here is an impassable barrier to any present repeal of the existing charters of these associations, as well as against the resumption on the part of the Government of their chartered rights. Few of them have lived out even half of their chartered time, and some have just started. Any repeal could have no legal effect for ten years to come, and then it would be partial and only operative by dribbling installments as each bank reached the period of twenty years from the date of its organization. During this time the national banks must linger as public institutions, although branded and paralyzed as discarded public servants. We can put a rope around the necks of the national banks, but we cannot choke the life out of them all at once; and when their shareholders, among whom will be found many executors, administrators, guardians, and trustees, shall have redeemed their circulating notes and call upon the Treasurer of the United States for their deposited bonds, they must be given back, to be again thrown upon the market or paid for in gold, as we have promised. The indebtedness of the country will not have been diminished by a single dollar, and the same round sum of interest must be paid, whether the bonds are held by banks or by individuals. Nor have we any legal or moral right to assail their value while held by the Government as the property of the banks. If they were the property of an enemy, we should be ashamed to undermine the value of our own obligations. We may, it is true, offer to pay all of our own bonds by a further issue of legal-tender notes, if a majority of Congress should be so minded and the Supreme Court in time of peace should not intervene to prevent it; but this would be such a reckless stride toward the abyss of repudiation that the end of the Republic could not be far off, and we might well prepare for shooting Niagara! But if such a measure, based upon the execrable Macchiavelian doctrine that "a thing may be politically right, though morally wrong," could be carried, and the Government should limit the new issue of legal-tenders to the amount now outstanding, with only the addition of an amount equal to the present circulation of the national banks, how could the Government bring about the exchange of a non-interest-bearing debt for any part of our interest-bearing debt? We might easily expand the public debt by increasing our expenditures, or by withholding all revenues, and at the same time paying out the legal-tenders; but legal-tenders in the hands of the Government could not be exchanged at par for interest-bearing bonds in the hands of the public until after a resumption of specie payments, or until they become equal in value, either by raising the one or by depressing the other. The proposed increase of legal-tenders to the amount of seven or eight hundred million dollars means a great reduction of their value, a postponement of specie resumption forever, and a swift entrance upon the road to ruin, whence there is no return.

The notes of the national banks circulate from Maine to California, from Minnesota to Texas, without even a shade of discount. No other currency ever secured this supreme advantage, and the country will not now be contented with less. The holders of these notes have never lost a dollar, and never will, by any bank failures. Whether a bank-note is good or not nobody ever stops to inquire, and the vile business of counterfeiting, it is likely, will soon be numbered among the lost arts.

It is true that the national banks have banking privileges, and without them there would be no banks. Among these privileges comes the right to a limited circulation, much less in volume than any to which national or State banks have been heretofore restricted. For these privileges the banks pay to the General Government a fixed and, what is supposed to be, an equitable tax, and then in addition they are subject to all the taxation to which any other personal property is liable in the States where they may be established, from which bonds not used for banking purposes are exempt. It would seem that no arrangement could be more just to the nation and none more acceptable to the States or to the people.

It may be that the banks keep in circulation something more than would be possible if their notes had to be redeemed in specie whenever demanded, and it may be true, also, that the premium on gold received as interest on their bonds swells their profits; but it is very clear that the resumption of specie payments would prove an adequate remedy for all such anomalies. It may also be true that many prosperous banks too largely expand their line of discounts based upon deposits, regardless of all just proportion to their capital; and, if so, further legislation to control the maximum amount of loans made wholly upon deposits, and in excess of actual capital, may be had by the imposition of a higher tax or by the requirement of a larger reserve.

A large line of deposits is evidence of confidence, and needs no restriction; but a bank with a small capital which makes large loans, relying upon the stability of deposits as its main resource, and paying interest thereon, is engaged in the business of direct inflation, with the highest probability of succumbing to the first breath of any financial storm, and deserves to have fixed metes and bounds beyond which it may not go.

The system of national banks may require further legislation for the removal of defects and to make it more acceptable; but, standing on the broadest basis of security and freedom, it has already been so much perfected as to surpass any other we have ever subjected to a practical test, and it is now wholly free. Wherever sufficient capital can be gathered for the purpose, there a national bank may be organized. There is no monopoly; and yet the eagerness to multiply them is not commensurate with the recent wailings as to their rarity in many hungry and "more money" loving districts of the country. With such improvements as experience may from time to time suggest, it is doubtful whether we shall soon find anything which will better promote the public welfare; but it is not doubtful, if we confess our inability now to redeem the United States legal-tender notes, that to double the amount would double our inability.

CAPITAL.

What we most need after specie resumption to completely remedy our financial condition is more real and absolute capital. All the financial tinkering in the world will not supply that. The magnificent extent of our various enterprises has absorbed much of the unemployed wealth we had left after the waste of the war. The national debt; the immense amount invested in railroads, now floating on a troubled sea of bonded debt; the banking capital, represented mainly by the debt of the Government; the exhaustive drain of prodigal expenditures, public and private, all combined have brought a heavy strain upon our country, from which we cannot wholly recover except by years of frugality and a more universal industry. All of the cheap expedients for making money plenty without earning it, or without giving anything in exchange for it, or of obtaining tickets gratis in a lottery wholly of capital prizes, will result in disreputable failure. The sooner we learn that money cannot be invented, but must be earned, the better for the country. Even inflation on the grandest scale will not inflate those having nothing to inflate, nor will it help a breadless man to a bushel of wheat or give a brand-new hat to a man with a shocking bad one. It will only enable the owner of the wheat to get two dollars for the bushel when he only got one before, but the two dollars will be worth only half price. If with his dollar he could only pay for a cocked-up old hat, he will find that his two dollars will only pay for an old cocked-up hat.

NOT THE AMERICAN SYSTEM.

It is not enough that all the delusive witchcraft of inconvertible paper money has long ago been exposed and that the witches and wizards hang gibbeted on every page of history, but we have some later enthusiasts who are ambitious to have a new era of paper money with which to pay all debts, conduct all commerce and trade, and permanently fasten it upon the country as "the American system." But, if this should be the crowning work of American statesmen, who would covet the name? Our solemn pledges of the public faith would be wholly disregarded, and our country, with all its thrift and solid sense, consigned to the pitiful degredation of paper-money idolatry. The prostitution of the American name to a system so foreign—the branded outcast of nations—shows audacity and does not conceal its rascality. There are many things honest and of good report of which Americans may well be proud, but we ought to protest against having our name attached to that which would forever be cast in our teeth as a national reproach.

A DEBASED CURRENCY DEMORALIZING.

The degradation of whatever circulates as money below the recognized standard of the civilized world degrades not only commerce, but the people who in their daily business come in contact with the false standard imposed upon them. They feel that the Government to which they owe their highest allegiance and reverence has cheated them in a sensitive point by diminishing the measure, diluting the value of the money which should flow into their pockets; and, thus provoked, they are most unlikely not to profit by the instruction as to what may be used as lawful tender. Is it any worse for the people than for the Government to scrimp in measure? Can they be expected to carry their wool to market white as snow when they are likely to receive nothing in return but shoddy? Are they to be honest and pay one hundred cents on the dollar while the Government prevaricates and pays but eighty-five cents? What is bought will be sold. It is too apparent that trade is now demoralized and there is no venture warrantable in the world of traffic unaccompanied by a wide margin of profit. It is seen that no bargain even on the shortest time can be squarely fulfilled, as the fluctuation of paper legal-tender always calls for more or less than what was nominated in the bond, and transfers the profit or loss of the transaction from the right side to the wrong side, to the confusion of all legitimate trade and of all exact limits to pending contracts. Stable business now often leads to ruin, and prodigal adventurers here and there suddenly wake up famous as millionaires. Discretion is robbed of its merit, and chance, the blindest of goddesses, rules the day. Bulls and bears among stock gamblers revel in their millennium. Is it strange that sound morality should be confounded; or that, instead of golden virtues, we too often find in their place nothing but the cheapest pinchbeck, impudently asserting itself to be better than gold tried by fire? Certainly this is not the safest training for the young men of America.

Public and private expenditures are now too largely based upon inflation; and so long as payments are made in the cheapest substitute for money nothing in return but cheap equivalents and cheap service can be obtained. Since the close of the war the aggregate losses from the uncalculating, headlong use of a debased currency have been enormous. Public works as well as private have been shingled over by millions of greenbacks, and represent more in cost than in real value. Manufacturers are not making a new dollar for an old one. Laboring-men have been discontented, grudgingly employed, and, like Charles Lamb, go to work late, and to make amends retire early. All that has been bought and paid for or run in debt for is already rated at a large percentage less than the nominal cost. Financial investments all have symptoms of the rickets—swollen heads and small legs—and the reductions which may come with returning health are wholly incomputable except where such reductions to a large extent have already been realized. No permanent restoration of industrial prosperity, no permanent employment of workingmen, no safety to working capital, can be expected until the Government permits its own operations, the labor of our people, and the business enterprise of the country to be based upon the solid foundations represented by gold and paper at par with gold, represented by restored peace and morality, in accordance with the unbroken experience of the wise among nations and in harmony with the instincts of a high-spirited people ashamed of the exploded devices of paying debts by a renewal of broken promises and ashamed of a vacillating standard of mercantile honor worthy only of a bankrupt people half maniac and half knave.

May I not invoke the aid of all earnest men in behalf of a measure designed to sustain the policy of a return to a sound currency, or of a return to the money of the Constitution?

Mr. President, I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reference will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Missouri yield the floor for a moment to allow the Chair to lay before the Senate some papers on his table?

Mr. BOGY. Certainly.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, in response to the resolution of the Senate of 27th of February last, requesting the President to institute inquiries as to the proper place for the establishment of a branch mint at some point in the Western States or Mississippi Valley, transmitting the report and accompanying papers of the Director of the Mint, who was charged with the duty of making the inquiries called for by the resolution; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General in response to the resolution of December 14, 1875, transmitting copies of the papers and documents on file in his Department relative to the treatment of United States prisoners confined in State penitentiaries; which, on motion of Mr. CLAYTON, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. LEVI P. LUCKEY, his secretary, announced that the President had, on the 24th of December, 1875, approved and signed the act (S. No. 78) to extend the duration of the court of commissioners of Alabama claims.

PACIFIC RAILROAD SUBSIDIES.

Mr. SARGENT. Before the order for the introduction of resolutions expired this morning the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] rose and requested that his bill might be taken up in order that he might speak upon it. At that time I desired to introduce a resolution, but yielded out of courtesy to him. I now ask leave to offer a resolution for consideration at this time.

There being no objection, the following resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary are instructed to inquire what legislation, if any, is necessary to secure indemnity to the United States for advances of interest paid and to be paid by the Government on account of subsidy bonds issued to the several Pacific railroad companies, and to secure indemnity against liability to pay the principal of such bonds by requiring the creation of sinking funds, or otherwise. Also, whether the issues of the companies' mortgage bonds under the act of 1864 were in excess of the amount necessary for the completion of said roads; and, if so, whether such issues are a first lien upon the roads. Also, whether any of the bonds of the United States issued in aid of said roads are a first lien on the same. And that the committee report by bill or otherwise.

COURTS IN THE INDIAN COUNTRY.

Mr. CLAYTON submitted the following resolution:

Whereas it is well known that large sums of money are annually expended for the administration of justice in the western district of Arkansas; and whereas a very large proportion of such expense is incurred in the trial of persons arrested for minor offenses against the laws of the United States committed in the Indian Territory; and whereas the cases of the class above mentioned are so numerous that it is impossible for the court in all cases to give such persons a speedy trial, thus causing great hardship to them by reason of their being taken long distances from their homes and denied such speedy trial as they have the right to demand; and whereas the several treaties between the United States and the Cherokee, Choctaw, Chickasaw, Creek, and Seminole Nations of Indians, concluded in 1866, provide for the establishment of a United States court in the Indian country commonly known as the Indian Territory, as follows, namely: The Cherokee treaty, article 13: "The Cherokees also agree that a court or courts may be established by the United States in said Territory, with such jurisdiction and organized in such manner as may be prescribed by law: Provided, That the judicial tribunals of the Nation shall be allowed to retain exclusive jurisdiction in all civil and criminal causes arising within their country in which members of the Nation by nativity or adoption shall be the only parties, or where the cause of action shall arise in the Cherokee Nation, except as otherwise provided in the treaty." The Choctaw and Chickasaw treaty, article 8, section 8: "The Choctaws and Chickasaws also agree that a court or courts may be established in said Territory, with such jurisdiction and organization as Congress may prescribe: Provided, That the same shall not interfere with the local judiciary of either of said nations." The Creek treaty, article 10: "The Creeks agree to such legislation as Congress and the President of the United States may deem necessary for the better administration of justice and the protection of the rights of persons and property within the Indian Territory: Provided, however, That said legislation shall not in any manner interfere with or annul their present tribal organization, rights, laws, privileges, and customs." "The Creeks also agree that a court or courts may be established in said Territory, with such jurisdiction and organized in such manner as Congress may by law provide." The Seminole treaty, article 7: "The Seminole Nation agree to such legislation as Congress and the President deem necessary for the better administration of the rights of the person and property within the Indian Territory: Provided, however, That said legislation shall not in any manner interfere with or annul their present tribal organization, rights, laws, privileges, and customs." "The Seminoles also agree that a court or courts may be established in said Territory, with such jurisdiction and organized in such manner as Congress may by law provide:" Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing one or more inferior courts in the Indian Territory for the trial of all minor offenses committed in said Territory in cases where the Federal court now has jurisdiction, and shall embrace all offenses of petit larceny where the property stolen shall not exceed $25 in value, and all offenses arising from the introduction and sale of spirituous liquors in said Indian country.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. President, I ask the Senate to consider this resolution now. I do not think it will probably lead to any debate This is a resolution calling upon the Judiciary Committee to inquire into the propriety of establishing minor courts in the Indian Territory; and I can illustrate the necessity for such an inquiry. Take the case of a minor offense, say where a person in the Indian Territory has stolen a cow at Fort Sill. Under the present law that person must be arrested by a United States marshal, carried some three hundred miles across the Territory; a preliminary investigation must be had before a commissioner; witnesses must attend that investigation; if the commissioner binds him over, and if he is not able to give bond, he must lie in jail, frequently for months, awaiting a trial; when the court assembles it becomes necessary to send out three or four hundred miles to bring in the witnesses in the case; when they get there perhaps other business is before the court, and these witnesses must remain at Fort Smith from day to day for days; and when the case is finally disposed of, there is probably a fine of twenty-five or thirty dollars imposed, and an expense has been incurred of from five hundred to a thousand dollars.

Mr. SARGENT. Which is paid by the Government of the United States.

Mr. CLAYTON. Paid by the Government of the United States. You will therefore readily see, Mr. President, that there ought to be some way whereby such cases could be disposed of summarily and at once in the vicinity where the offense is committed. This resolution is merely to have the Judiciary Committee inquire into the propriety of establishing courts for that purpose in the Indian Territory. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will proceed to consider the resolution at once.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I observed, from the reading of the resolution, that the resolution itself fixes the jurisdiction of this court, and does not leave it to the discretion of the committee to decide upon the jurisdiction or to report to the Senate what it should be.

Mr. CLAYTON. I shall be glad if the Senator will make any suggestion of amendment in that respect, and I will accept it.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I would leave out all after the word "jurisdiction."

Mr. CLAYTON. Let it be read the way the Senator proposes to amend it.

Mr. THURMAN. I suggest, if the Senator from Arkansas will allow me, that this preamble contains a number of recitals that perhaps the Senate, not having looked into the matter, are not able to say are strictly correct, as they would do by adopting the resolution.

Then there is another very material question, as to our power, under the Constitution of the United States, to establish courts in the way that is proposed in the resolution, if I understand it rightly. I make the suggestion to him that, instead of asking the adoption of the resolution, he move to refer the resolution itself to the Committee on the Judiciary. That course has been taken frequently, and the committee has never failed to consider a subject so referred and to report such a resolution as they think the exigencies of the case require.

Mr. CLAYTON. The force of this proposition is for the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the propriety of legislation.

Mr. THURMAN. I know it is.

Mr. CLAYTON. And of course, if this resolution is adopted, it will still be proper for the Committee on the Judiciary to determine whether the legislation proposed is constitutional or not. If they report back that the legislation is not according to the Constitution or the treaties, that is an end of the whole thing.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator, I think, does not take exactly the point. Here is a resolution, with a long preamble, reciting that the facts are thus and so and that the laws are thus and so——

Mr. CLAYTON. I am perfectly willing to strike out the preamble.

Mr. THURMAN. Then the resolution would be meaningless, because it refers to the matters recited in the preamble. Again and again the Senate has referred a resolution itself to a committee, and the committee has always then, when it found the subject was a proper one for inquiry either reported that resolution with a recommendation that it pass, or reported it with modifications, and as modified it passed; and then the committee is instructed. I think that is the better course and is the safer mode. It will occasion no delay. The Senator is entirely right in saying that the subject ought to be inquired into; but I think it would be the safer course to refer the resolution itself to the Committee on the Judiciary; and I make that motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state to my colleague that the proposition is very well worded as an independent proposition without the preamble. It is a proposition that the Judiciary Committee be directed to inquire into the propriety of establishing certain courts. Let it be read.

Mr. CLAYTON. Let the resolution itself be read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the resolution read as it stands.

Mr. SHERMAN. Read the resolution first, and then the preamble.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well; read the resolution first, and then the preamble, if you like.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now let us have the preamble read, and then I shall have something to say.

The Chief Clerk read the preamble.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, it is altogether unwise, I should think, for the Senate to adopt that preamble without consideration by a committee, or in some way to ascertain precisely whether it is justified by the history of the event, and the treaties, and so forth, in that region. The preamble assumes as being positive facts a great variety of circumstances. I have no reason to suppose that my friend from Arkansas has misunderstood them, and that the preamble may not be perfectly correct; but we might just as well pass a bill which contained a variety of propositions instanter, without time for investigation, as to bind ourselves by an absolute declaration of this body to that preamble.

My friend from Arkansas says he is willing to strike out the preamble; but if the preamble be stricken out, the committee will have nothing to guide it (and certainly the preamble is very valuable for that purpose) in respect of the lines of investigation the Senator desires us to enter upon and the state of the case which he thinks warrants our proceeding in the way he desires. Therefore I suggest to him—indeed I believe the Senator from Ohio has already suggested—that the best way to get action on the whole subject would be to refer the entire preamble and resolution, without adopting them, to the committee, which we shall of course take as an instruction to consider the subject embodied in the resolution; and if we are of opinion that there ought to be legislation, of course we shall report it.

Mr. CLAYTON. I am perfectly willing that that course shall be adopted, if the Committee on the Judiciary do consider, when the resolution is referred to them, that they shall take action if they find that this preamble is as is set forth. What I want, and the only thing I want, is that the attention of the Senate through its proper committee should be brought to this question. I think that it is very important. I think you never will decrease the expense of holding courts in the Indian country for the administration of justice there without some such legislation as is looked for in this resolution. It is very clear to my mind that there must be more courts there that will be able summarily, as these minor cases arise in the Indian Territory, to sweep them away, and thus prevent the enormous expense which is incurred nearly every day in the carrying from distant points in the Indian country to Fort Smith, hundreds of miles, persons who have committed offenses of a very trifling character.

Now, of course, if the reference of this resolution to the Judiciary Committee will enable these results to be reached and procure speedy action, I am willing that it shall take that course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the reference of the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, I entirely agree with the Senator from Arkansas as to the importance of this subject. For a great many years the Government has been subjected to a very large expenditure of money in the trial of the offenses spoken of by him. It is really a matter which needs legislation, and is a subject of very great importance. I think it is much better presented by letting the whole resolution, preamble and all, go to the Committee on the Judiciary, who will investigate the matter thoroughly. If that be done, the whole subject then will be before the committee, and I know from my individual knowledge that it is a matter which deserves investigation, and that at an early day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator to give way for a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BOGY. I do not intend to occupy the floor more than a few minutes. But first I will inquire of the Chair what disposition has been made of the bill offered by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.] Has it been referred?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BOGY. I move that that vote be reconsidered; my intention being then to move the postponement of the subject until some time in February, when I shall desire to speak upon the subject. I wish to say a few words now, if it be proper to do so, in answer to a few of the positions taken by the Senator from Vermont; but, in doing so, I shall occupy the attention of the Senate only a few moments.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I make no objection.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion to refer Senate bill No. 157 to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BOGY. My intention now is to move that the subject be postponed until the first Tuesday in February.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. That I should object to. I understood the Senator only desired to address the Senate now or to-morrow; but I should not be willing to have the bill postponed until February. I desire to have it immediately considered by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BOGY. I did not exactly hear the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I said to the Senator that I understood he desired to address the Senate now.

Mr. BOGY. Not now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I would have no objection to allowing the bill to remain on the table for a day or two; but I should not like to consent to have the consideration of it postponed until February, for I desire to get it before the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BOGY. I am not anxious for a long postponement, and yet I desire to speak on the subject and I am not prepared to do so now, nor can I be prepared within a very few days, having other matters to attend to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I can say to the Senator that there will be abundant opportunity for him to address the Senate on the same topic, if not upon this bill, and therefore it is not necessary to retain this bill on the table.

Mr. BOGY. This bill, in my estimation, presents the subject perhaps in a wider scope than any bill which can be presented. It is the marrow of the whole thing. It is a bill which must engage not only the attention of the Senate but the attention of the entire country; for the effects of it, if I understand the measure correctly—of course I have not yet had time to study it—will be most sweeping; and I would much prefer, if the matter should be postponed, to speak on this bill.

The Senator from Vermont also has, by way of anticipation, answered the bill which I presented a few days ago proposing that the duties on imports should be payable in legal-tenders and national-bank notes. A large portion of his speech to-day was devoted to that subject. I listened to his argument with a great deal of attention and at a proper time should like to answer the argument he advanced, but I am not prepared to do so now. I can do so, however, in the course of a week or two, as soon as I have time to prepare myself.

I will say this while I am up, that the bill proposed by the Senator from Vermont, which is intended to lead to resumption, in my opinion does not resume at all. The effect of the bill is merely to cancel and destroy all the legal-tender notes now in existence and to substitute in lieu of those notes an equal amount of 4½ per cent. bonds payable in coin, and the result would then be to have no legal-tenders at all, but to have in their place bonds. That would not be resumption. It is true there would be no necessity of resuming payment of that which would no longer exist. The legal-tenders being no longer in existence, resumption would not be necessary. But nevertheless it would not be resumption. That is, gold would not be provided for the purpose of effecting resumption, but the subject to be resumed would have been destroyed or canceled by an equivalent amount of bonds. That, if I understand the bill of the Senator correctly, would be the effect. Now, this subject of resumption is presented in different ways. First, it is presented by the bill that was passed here in January last, which provides that bonds shall be sold for gold, and that the gold, of course, shall be brought to this country to pay the legal-tenders. I objected to the bill at the time, believing then, as I believe now, that it was not feasible; that the gold could not be obtained in Europe; that, although it does exist in sufficient quantities there, yet for many reasons familiar to Senators here, the gold could not be obtained there for the purpose of being brought here. Again, if the gold was brought here, unless there were reasons of a financial character based upon great commercial facts, the gold would not remain here, as gold will remain nowhere in the world unless its remaining be in accordance with the laws of commerce and the laws of finance affecting that nation.

The President in his message says the resumption bill of last January will not effect the purpose unless it be modified. The Secretary of the Treasury in his report says the resumption bill will not effect its purpose unless it be modified. The Senator from Vermont says the resumption bill will not effect its purpose unless it be modified in the way that he proposes.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I think the Senator does not intend to misinterpret what was said by the President or the Secretary, or what has been said by myself. I have not certainly said any such thing. I do not understand that it has been said by anybody. My own belief is that the power given under the law of last year is abundant; but I think it can be supplemented by legislation such as I have proposed, or somewhat similar, that will make it less a burden upon the people to resume. For instance, I have already argued that it would be less expense to the Government, and more easily applied, for the Government to retire some of the surplus legal-tenders than it would be to go into the market and buy gold.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, of course I have no disposition to give a wrong construction to what has been said in the President's message, or a wrong construction to what has been said in the Secretary's report, or to the speech of the gentleman from Vermont, or to his bill. I may misunderstand all those things. I have tried to make a study of the message and of the report. This, however, is not the time, nor the occasion, to go into this discussion. All I desire now to say is that I have no disposition to do either of those parties any injustice.

I am, and I wish it distinctly understood, in favor of specie resumption. The Senator from Vermont said a great deal, and said it well, with regard to the disastrous effects of inflation. I am not an inflationist; I do not stand here as the advocate of inflation per se; but I oppose now, and will continue to oppose, any attempt at resumption which can in the remotest degree bring about the slightest contraction of the paper money of this country. Not that I am in love with paper money, but I acknowledge the fact of the existence of paper money; I acknowledge the fact that the business of this country is now greatly based upon that existing fact. I had nothing to do with its creation; even the party with which I have the honor and the pleasure to act had nothing to do with its creation. That whole system was the work of your own party, sir, of the party with which you are acting. But the fact is nevertheless true that this paper money exists to the amount of seven hundred and odd million dollars in this country, and I will myself support no measure which leads to contraction. I look upon the measure of the gentleman from Vermont as one of contraction to the very highest degree, because it leads to the annihilation of the $382,000,000 of legal-tenders now provided by law—the entire annihilation of that vast sum; and although I am not in favor of an unlimited amount of legal-tender notes, and although I am not in favor of the issue of legal-tender notes so as to supersede the national-bank notes, nevertheless I am opposed to their contraction. I believe that the legal-tender notes now outstanding should remain out, and be used as a medium of exchange by the people of this country in all their commercial transactions to an amount equal to the wants of the Treasury of the United States. Let that amount be limited by the very wants of the Treasury.

Mr. President, it is not my intention at this time to bring on a debate upon the subject or to engage in that debate myself. I look upon this measure as one of the very greatest importance; it may be the most important measure that can be brought before Congress at this session; and without being disposed to do the Senator from Vermont any injustice, even the slightest, I must say that his bill strikes me as something terribly bad, leading to the annihilation of the legal-tender notes, providing not for one dollar of gold when the legal-tenders shall be annihilated, and at the same time requiring that in a very short period the national banks shall redeem their own circulation in coin. The amount of national-bank notes now, I presume, is about $370,000,000; and yet, on the 1st of January, 1878, two years from this time, those banks will be required, under the Senator's bill, to resume specie payment to the extent of one-fourth, which will require $92,500,000. In a year later they are required to have on hand one-half of the amount, which will be $185,000,000—an amount in excess of the gold in the country; and in a year later they are required to have three-fourths of the amount of their circulation on hand, which will be $277,000,000.

Mr. THURMAN. Reserve, not circulation.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The Senator from Missouri evidently does not intend to misrepresent the bill before the Senate, and yet he has fallen into a very serious mistake. If he will look at the cash reserve, or the lawful money reserve, he will find that it is only $105,000,000; and this bill proposes merely that a fourth part of that sum, a year hence, shall be retained in gold. It does not propose any more than about the same sum which will be paid to the banks by the Government itself as the interest on the bonds the Government holds for the banks.

Mr. BOGY. I have not had time to study the bill, of course, for it has only been printed and laid on our tables during the morning; but I see now on looking at it that the proportion of gold required to be held on hand by the banks at the times mentioned applies only to the reserve, and I am very happy to correct the remark I made in that respect; but even then where is the gold to come from? You have not provided by your bill for a dollar of gold to be brought here; you have not provided in any way for getting gold; and yet you require this thing and impose this great burden on the banks.

Now, sir, while I favor resumption, believing that it is necessary that at some day or other we should go back to the hard-pan, believing that there is nothing but gold and silver which can properly be made a legal-tender; agreeing with the Senator from Vermont entirely upon that subject, I shall be opposed to any measure which is intended to effect that object by the way of contraction. Hence I proposed the other day in good faith, not as a democrat, humble though I be in the party, but merely on my individual responsibility, a bill providing for the payment of duties in legal-tenders and national-bank notes, my object being to appreciate the paper money but not to contract it. The Senator from Vermont at that time took occasion to reply to the few remarks I made, as I have taken occasion to reply to his speech to-day, and said that the Government was under obligation to provide for the payment of both the interest on the bonds and the principal from the gold received through the custom-house. That argument can be answered.

I repeat, however, Mr. President, that it is not my intention at this time to go at length into this subject. I would like, at a proper time, to say something more at length; and I therefore move that the bill be postponed. I should prefer to have it postponed to some time in February, but I will make the time shorter if that be preferred. I move now that the bill be postponed until the first Tuesday in February.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I hope the Senator will not ask for so long a delay. A Senator so ready as he is to leap into debate and conduct himself handsomely upon any subject certainly does not require so long a time to consider the question now before the Senate, and it seems to me that it is important that the bill should go to the Committee on Finance at an early day. I therefore move to amend the proposition made by the Senator by proposing that this bill be postponed until next Monday.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I think this bill had better go to the Finance Committee at once, or it had better be postponed, as the Senator from Missouri suggests, to some time in February, because I imagine that it is not very politic and will not be a very wise thing in the Senate to enter next week, or at any time earlier than some time in February, upon a discussion of the subject-matter of this bill and the much broader field of inquiry suggested by the speech of the Senator from Vermont. It requires some time to study the reports that have been made at this session—the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, the message of the President of the United States, all of which ought to be carefully studied and considered, as well as any suggestions that may be made by the Finance Committee, and, above all, any reports that may come from that committee—before we enter upon the discussion of so important a subject as this.

Two years ago we witnessed three months of the time of this body taken up in nothing but speech-making upon the currency. I hope we are not to have any such exhibition now, but that whatever we do shall have a practical bearing and be marked by practical good sense. Now, so far as referring this bill to the Finance Committee is concerned, such reference is not necessary in order to give that committee full jurisdiction over the subject. By the very constitution of that committee it is authorized to report, by bill or otherwise, upon this entire subject without any reference to it whatsoever. I think I am not mistaken in that respect.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senator is mistaken entirely.

Mr. THURMAN. Am I?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. THURMAN. Well, if I am mistaken in that, I certainly am not mistaken in one thing, that the reference of so much of the President's message as relates to this subject, the reference of the bill of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BOGY,] gives that committee complete and ample jurisdiction. There is no question about that.

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury, I am reminded, has also been referred to the committee, which gives it charge of the subject. There is no doubt, then, of the complete jurisdiction of that committee, and the distinguished Senator from Vermont is a prominent member of that committee, and can press his views upon it whenever he sees fit, as certainly he will consider it proper for him to do.

There is, then, practically, Mr. President, no necessity for an immediate reference of this bill, and yet I should prefer an immediate reference of it to having a debate precipitated upon the Senate in a few days upon this great measure. I for one want to act with great consideration in whatever step I take. I have some ideas that I think are pretty clear to myself—they may not be to other persons—and I want time to consider, as others may want time to consider, before we are precipitated into a debate upon a question so important as this.

Now, sir, if this bill be postponed—and I should prefer that the postponement be to the second Tuesday in February, if it occur at all—that will not delay the Committee on Finance from considering the subject, and it will give time for those who are disposed earnestly to study this question to come prepared to give to the Senate the benefit of their reflections and of their investigations.

Mr. BOGY. I will agree to its being referred now.

Mr. THURMAN. As the Senator from Missouri now says he has no objection to its being referred, I certainly have none. Whenever the Senate is prepared to discuss this question I have no doubt it will be easy enough to find a means of discussing it. Before, however, this bill is referred I wish to call the attention of the Senator who introduced it, and the committee to whom it is to be referred, to one thing. The third section provides—

> That all national banking associations shall be, and hereby are, required to hold in coin as part of their lawful money reserve, on and after the 1st day of January, 1877, one-fourth; after the 1st day of January, 1878, one-half; and after the 1st day of October, 1878, three-fourths.

This is a proposition that the banks shall hold in coin ultimately three-fourths of that reserve which by law they are required to keep. That reserve, so far as they were bound to keep a reserve as a security for their circulation, as the Senator knows, has been repealed. In other words, the reserve of 15 per cent. for country banks and 25 per cent. for banks in the redemption cities for circulation was repealed two years ago. Then the only reserve the banks are now required to keep is the reserve of 15 per cent. of their deposits in the country and 25 per cent. in the redemption cities, if my memory is correct, unless the Senator calls the 5 per cent. redemption-fund here in the Treasury a part of their reserve, and I believe they are authorized so to consider it. Then, what is the proposition of the Senator from Vermont? It is that the reserve which is to be kept for the security of the depositors shall in the future be three-fourths in gold. For whose benefit? The object of the Senator is to arrive at specie payment—at payment of the circulating notes of the bank; and, if I understand his proposition, he proposes to divert three-fourths of the reserve which the law now requires to be kept for the benefit of depositors to a wholly different purpose: a resumption of specie payments on the circulating notes of the bank.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to say that I quite agree with the Senator that the national banks ought to prepare for specie payment, and they ought to prepare for it, in my judgment, by holding coin; and I think it would be no more than just that they should be required to hold every dollar of interest which we pay to them upon the bonds on deposit in the Treasury, from year to year, until they do resume specie payment. I believe that that would be a wise measure, and I believe that it would gradually and certainly bring them into that condition when they could with safety not only resume but maintain specie payment. But I am not prepared to divert the security which the depositors have to a wholly different purpose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator from Ohio a question?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How can a bank resume specie payments so long as the notes of the United States are out, which by law are a legal tender for the redemption of bank-notes as well as anything else?

Mr. THURMAN. If I should go into that, I would have to do exactly the thing I said I did not want to do—that is, go into a discussion. I think it is practicable for both the Government and the banks to resume, and I am in favor of both resuming.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But the Senator does not answer my question; and that is, how the banks are to resume until the Government does; in short, so long as by law the bank may tender a United States note for its own bill when presented?

Mr. THURMAN. I have said that I was not going into a discussion of this matter at this time. When the proper time comes I shall endeavor to show to the Senate, in my poor way, how I think both the Government and the banks can resume; it will be time enough then, if my argument should be so defective as the Senator thinks it is, for him to put his question, but not now.

The only thing I wished to say now was simply to call the attention of the Senator from Vermont to what seemed to be the effect of his third section, and to ask him if it was not really diverting a security which the law now gives to the depositor to a wholly different purpose? If that be his intention, well and good; but if that be not his intention, it is a matter worth his consideration.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It seems to me astonishing that so clear a head as the Senator from Ohio has should not see that having a portion of the reserve held in coin instead of legal-tenders is no diversion from the object. If the bill which I have presented should pass in the shape in which I have presented it, it would still leave the banks with a reserve, but it would be a reserve of a quarter at one time, and a half at a subsequent time, and three-fourths at a later time, in coin instead of legal-tenders. Now, one of the great difficulties we have about a resumption of specie payments is the vast amount of deposits held by the bauks, which are sure to be called for whenever specie resumption takes place. There is another thing that is intended to be obviated by the bill presented by me. I seek to obviate any possibility by which the banks could take the whole sum of their legal-tenders, amounting to-day to two hundred and thirty-four millions, and present them instanter whenever the Government should resume.

The bill introduced to-day is supplementary to the first bill. The first bill prepares the way by providing the means by which the Secretary of the Treasury can obtain any amount of gold to redeem the legal-tenders. This supplements it, by allowing the Secretary, instead of doing it all in that way, to receive legal-tenders by the issue of a low-interest-bearing bond. It seems to me that it is not a bill so "terribly bad" as the Senator from Missouri apprehends. But as the Senator from Missouri has withdrawn his objection to having it immediately referred, I hope the reference will take place at once; and as I certainly think he can at any time address the Senate upon various propositions that have been presented, or will be presented perhaps by some report from the Committee on Finance, there is no difficulty in his having the ear of the Senate at any time he chooses.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I only wish to say a word, not about this bill, but about the act to which this is a supplementary provision. The Senator from Missouri has said that the bill of my colleague does not provide for accumulating coin in the Treasury, or words to that effect; that it contains no provision to enable the United States to accumulate coin to pay specie for its United States notes on the 1st of January, 1879. I beg leave to call the attention of my friend from Missouri to the law that we already have upon the statute-book, the act of January 14, 1875. It is true that this act did not receive the votes of our brethren of the democratic party in the Senate—I believe not any of them—and I must suppose, therefore, that all it contains is contrary to their notions of finance and of the public welfare. This act does provide that—

> On and after the 1st day of January, anno Domini 1879, the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem in coin the United States legal-tender notes then outstanding on their presentation for redemption at the office of the assistant treasurer of the United States in the city of New York in sums of not less than $50.

And it further provides:

> And to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare and provide for the redemption in this act authorized or required, he is authorized to use any surplus revenues from time to time in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to issue, sell, and dispose of, at not less than par, in coin, either of the descriptions of bonds of the United States described in the act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," with like qualities, privileges, and exemptions, to the extent necessary to carry this act into full effect, and to use the proceeds thereof for the purposes aforesaid.

Now, Mr. President, if it is possible for human language in the way of legislation to give absolute power without limitation to the finance officer of this Goverment to take all of its revenues and all of its credit to redeem this promise that we have made to our citizens and to our bill-holders, that on the 1st of January, 1879, and afterwards whenever presented, we will pay these United States notes in coin, then I do not know what the meaning of language is. All the surplus revenue of the Government from this time forth is devoted to this purpose.

Mr. BOGY. There is no surplus revenue.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That depends, Mr. President—it depends upon how successful the Government is in collecting the tax upon whisky in the Western States. It depends upon how successful this Government is in diminishing large appropriations for rivers and harbors in the East and in the West.

Mr. BOGY. Will the gentleman excuse me for suggesting that if you will appoint honest men from your party to go there it will be honestly collected; we will consume the article and pay the tax, if you will appoint proper men to collect it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That begs another question. Probably if we were to appoint honest men, we should be obliged to appoint them from our party. [Laughter.] I agree to that. But that is not all the question, Mr. President. Honest men! A single collector of internal revenue and a single inspector, and whatever the machinery is, cannot collect the revenues in any part of the country unless they are sustained by the good sense and public sentiment of the people. Every infraction of law must be reached and punished by a judicial proceeding, and every judicial proceeding, under our system, must depend upon the judgment of twelve men as to the facts, selected from the neighborhood where the offense is supposed to have been committed. Therefore we cannot say that the selection of honest officers, as important as it is—of primary and indispensable importance, I agree—is enough to insure the collection of the revenues. But I am glad to say also, for the honor of the State which my friend in part represents, that so far we have no reason to complain of the body of the community in that State in respect of doing its duty when the facts are presented in bringing to punishment people who have been guilty of violating these laws. But this is a digression.

I repeat, Mr. President, that all the revenues of the Government, from the date of the passage of this act, not otherwise appropriated, are pledged for carrying out this promise, thus made in spite of the vote of my democratic friends, that the United States will keep its plighted faith and pay its legal-tender notes finally and forever. They are done with, if we can only keep up the credit of this Government to the standard which will enable the Secretary of the Treasury between now and that time to borrow money at 5 per cent. to pay off this floating debt, as it may justly be called, I think, that we have issued, and when paid off there is the end of it. You may abolish the national banks, if you please, and set up State banks; that is another question; but, so far as we are concerned—we having for fourteen years been under protest in the respect of not paying the dollar which we have promised to pay, in what is called the greenback, to the honest citizen who has earned it by his hard labor, but compelling him to take another piece of paper of the same character, neither of which has had the purchasing power it ought to have—we have now entered upon a fresh promise, to which we have devoted, so far as our votes can go, all the revenues and all the credit of the Government. Therefore, Mr. President, I shall not be greatly concerned, so long as the administration of the finances of this country is in the honest hands that it is now, and so long as the General Government of this country shall continue in the sincere hands of the real friends of specie payments, as it is now, we shall redeem this promise.

But, sir, when we passed this bill, although great fault was suggested, though there were doubts and shakings of heads, no Senator on the other side offered any substitute. None of them had any plan that he was willing to present. None of them was for any thing that he was willing to tell us of in the shape of legislation; but he was for everything besides the actual and straightforward measure which was presented and passed by republican, and not by democratic, votes.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, in answer to the remarks made by the Senator from Vermont nearest me, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] I will say that there is no surplus revenue now, and we have no right to expect between this and the 1st day of January, 1879, any surplus revenue.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then may I ask my friend to unite with us in providing a surplus revenue which will enable us to still further fortify ourselves and keep our promise?

Mr. BOGY. That depends upon how the thing is to be provided. I cannot pledge myself in advance. The Senator's mode of doing it may not suit me.

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend will allow me to say that I am very sorry to hear him state that there will be no surplus revenue. There has been even this last year, the very hardest year we have had in our finances, a surplus revenue of from ten to fifteen million dollars, and we have been promised—I know from personally hearing the promises made by representatives of the people—that there will be a saving of somewhere between one and fifty million dollars, which will be more than sufficient (even half of it if nothing more be done) to leave a large surplus revenue between now and January, 1879. When the Senator says there is no longer any hope of a surplus revenue in the next two or three years, he as much as says that these representatives will not fulfill the pledges they have made to reduce our expenses by a careful and methodical investigation of all sources of expenditure. If they fulfill their pledges, the expenditures will be reduced sufficiently, without any increase of revenue, to enable us to redeem our pledges.

Mr. BOGY. I have no doubt, Mr. President, that if the very measures which will be inaugurated by the democratic House of Representatives, and passed there, shall be passed by the Senate, there will be a surplus revenue. [Laughter.] I have not the least doubt of it; but I have no such hope; I have no such expectation. Therefore I say that there is now no surplus revenue, and I am very sorry to say that in my opinion there will be none by January, 1879.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask my friend, if I do not interrupt him, what the measures thus inaugurated are? I am a little behind the times.

Mr. BOGY. At the proper time I will take great pains and pleasure to explain those measures to my friend, hoping, from what I know of his patriotic disposition, that he may be an exception to his party, and vote for some of them. [Laughter.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. I dare say I shall if they are economical.

Mr. BOGY. The Senator from Vermont spoke of surplus revenue, and he objected to the remark I made in answer to the speech and the bill of the other Senator from Vermont, because, he says, there is a measure now on the statute-book providing for doing so and so. I say the measure is there in words, but it will be a dead-letter. First, there will be no surplus revenue, although the Senator from Ohio says there is now a surplus revenue. Without placing myself in a position to contradict that Senator, I do say that, according to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, there is no surplus revenue, when the matter is properly understood and properly analyzed. Again, some millions have accumulated there by the sale of gold, which is a part of the revenue at the present day. I believe that the measure now before the Senate, if adopted, will virtually supersede the law already on our statute-book, and that measure is not intended or calculated to bring to this country a single dollar in gold. That will necessarily be the effect of the bill; because we do know—every Senator must know—that it is next to an impossibility to bring gold from Europe here to a large amount. Capitalists in Europe will not buy your bonds if it is known that the gold is to be brought here from England, or France, or Germany. It cannot be done; gold cannot be moved from one nation to another in that way. Those are not the currents which float gold, if gold can float at all; they are not the currents which carry gold to any part of the world. The currents that carry gold are great commercial currents, that sweep around the globe, and not these forced measures. War now and then, as the war between Prussia and France, may force gold from one country to another; but those same great laws of trade will bring the gold back to the place where the laws of trade found it at first. We are struck with the spectacle to-day that, though France was conquered and subjugated but yesterday, Prussia, which was victorious, and levying a tribute upon France of a thousand millions of dollars, and having that gold brought from France to Prussia, is now denuded of gold, and the gold has got back to France, and Prussia is in a state of great distress while France is flourishing. Hence I believe that the effect of the measure of the Senator from Vermont will be to supersede the present law, and that we shall be left with no gold in the country, with no legal-tenders, bad as they may be, yet answering a useful purpose, and with the national banks very much oppressed; and, if I am correct in that, it will bring the country to a state of perfect financial annihilation. I am opposed to it. But, sir, I do not wish to discuss the question at this time. After all that has been said, I am willing that the bill shall be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, I do not propose to engage in the discussion of the financial question at this time, nor do I think my friends on the other side of the House can taunt this side because we did not vote in a particular way a year ago. Sir, I have the honor in part to represent on this floor a people who are in favor of the resumption of specie payments honestly, and not, I trust, as a party measure for any party. I beg to say that this great question of finance ought not to be the foot-ball of parties. It is not anywhere else in any civilized country on the face of the earth. Go to England to-day, and Gladstone and Disraeli, differing on everything else, agree upon this one important question, that the precious metals form the only basis for the currency of a people. I have no doubt that both my friends from Vermont and myself agree upon this, that the only basis known to intelligent civilized nations for the currency of a people is the precious metals. There is no other. It is possible that the Senators from Vermont and myself may differ somewhat as to how we shall arrive at this point; but let us all, let Senators from every section of the country, arrive at this one point, that the only true basis of the currency of a people is gold and silver, and we shall have taken a long step in advance to the right.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I hope my friend from Connecticut will acquit me of making any party speech on this question.

Mr. EATON. I did not charge upon any gentleman on the other side the making of a partisan speech on the question; I have heard none. I simply said, and I certainly did not intend to wound the feelings of the other honorable Senator from Vermont when I said, that it struck me that little taunts ought not to be thrown from one side of the Chamber to the other with regard to a great question of this character. At all events, I shall not be led into a discussion of the subject-matter at this time. I am not prepared to say that I am in favor of the bill which has been presented by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] and upon which he has made, doubtless, a very able speech, all of which I have not heard, but shall be glad to read hereafter. But I desire to say this one word in reply to what the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] has said in regard to there being a surplus revenue this year. In my judgment, and I desire it to go out to the country, there is no surplus, and there will be found none, this year, no matter what figures may say. We will look into those figures. I have looked at them somewhat, and I say that there will be no surplus found. Of course men may write a surplus. Men have written that the debt of the country on a certain occasion was a thousand million dollars, when I knew it was eleven hundred million dollars. We will look into these figures by and by. I will let this Roland go with the gentleman's Oliver to the country. There will be no surplus found when the examination comes to be made at the proper time hereafter. I desire to have a surplus.

I do not agree with my friend from Missouri, [Mr. BOGY.] He says he would not contract the currency. I would. I will show my friend before I get through the discussion of this question, when we come to take it up at the proper time hereafter, that five hundred millions of currency appreciated to coin value will have one hundred million more purchasing power than the seven hundred and fifty millions of currency there is to-day afloat or seeking market. What we require for the benefit of the country is to appreciate the paper dollar to the gold dollar, and the very moment that you do that you increase $100,000,000 a year the purchasing power of the paper money, even if it does not pass but once in a year. The best educated financiers and merchants in the United States are of the opinion that money passes from hand to hand from three to six times a year. The lowest estimate is three times; the highest is six times. Suppose we have five hundred millions of currency only, instead of seven hundred and fifty millions; suppose that currency is appreciated to the gold standard, and suppose it passes three times a year only: how much is the purchasing power of the paper increased? It is increased $225,000,000, and there is a saving to the people of the United States of $225,000,000 every year that the sun rolls around three hundred and sixty-five times.

Now, I say to my own side of the Chamber, I say to Senators upon the other side of the Chamber, that it is our duty to approximate paper to gold, to so legislate—not as partisans, but as Americans, as men having only one interest in view—not to put up the republican party or to put down the democratic party, or to put up the democratic party and put down the republican party, but to legislate for the well-being of all of the people of this broad land. At all times, upon this question, without regard to politics and without regard to where my friend from Vermont may be, or where my friend from Delaware may be, I shall be prepared to legislate so as to bring paper up to gold. That is what we desire to do, and that is all that it is necessary to do. I have my own views upon this subject, and at the proper time I shall submit them. I have no doubt that we can legislate so as to resume specie payments before 1879 and not use the guide-post of the gentleman from Ohio at all. My own impression is that we ought to resume before that year, and we ought to begin to legislate now to do it. I am very frank to say that I would not have voted last year to resume specie payments in 1879, but I would have legislated in 1875 so as to resume in 1877, if possible. France is our example. She has paid specie when the law did not demand it, because her commercial men, her financial men, bent every energy toward specie payments without being ordered by law to do it.

Mr. President, I did not mean to detain the Senate so long at this time.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I was very happy to hear the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. EATON;] but he is the first gentleman of his party who has promised to aid us in the resumption of specie payments. If he will submit to the Senate a proposition in the form of a bill which in his judgment will bring us to resumption in 1877, or 1878, or 1879, he will be the most welcome gentleman of his party, I think, in the United States of America. In all the long debates which we have had upon currency and specie payment, we have never yet had an affirmative proposition from any member of that party looking to the resumption of specie payments; and when my friend from Connecticut submits his bill I shall hail him with the most hearty congratulation.

I do not intend to be led into a discussion of the financial question at this time. It is too serious a matter to be dealt with in an off-hand way at the end of an afternoon's debate. I welcome every speech that is made on this subject and every proposition that is offered. I hope all the propositions will be sent to the proper committee, and have a full and fair consideration, and that we may approach this question, not in the spirit of democrats or republicans, but in the spirit of men interested in a common country, desiring to bring about the best results to the whole people. That certainly is the spirit in which I think we should act. I consider ourselves bound by the highest obligation of duty and honor to bring about resumption on the 1st day of January, 1879. If any measure is proposed that will aid in bringing that about or tend in that direction, I will vote for it, I do not care whence it comes. If, on the other hand, any measure of a doubtful tendency is offered that will not tend in that direction, I will certainly vote against it. Whether any measure is necessary at all or not is an open question for debate. You have the President's views and the views of the Secretary of the Treasury. We are promised now the views of the Senator from Connecticut and his plan. When they are all before us, no doubt the Senate of the United States will come to conclusions satisfactory to it.

But, sir, I only rose to correct a misapprehension into which Senators have fallen in regard to the public debt and the condition of our finances. We are too much in the habit of crying down everything. To use a slang phrase of the brokers in Wall street, we are "bearing down" everything. No doubt we have had hard times. We have had a panic. I remember to have read recently in the memoirs of John Quincy Adams a description of affairs in 1819 and 1820, when everybody took a very gloomy view of affairs, when we had paper money which was good for nothing, broken-bank paper money, scattered all over the country, when the Government was embarrassed, when the revenues were difficult of collection, and the gloomiest of prophecies were made of failure and disaster and distress, and I remember a striking remark made by Mr. Calhoun, assented to by Mr. Adams, in which he thought everything was going by the board; and two or three years after that the tone was entirely changed and we had prosperity and happiness. Even now, when people are talking about disasters and hard times, (and no doubt people are feeling them in all parts of the country,) things are not so bad as they are represented to be.

The Senator from Connecticut says that we have not decreased the public debt; but even in the midst of all our troubles, even in the darkest days of our financial difficulties, he is entirely mistaken. We must rely upon our official reports. We know that the debt is constantly decreasing. We know that bonds are being bought up and canceled; and if the Senator wants to see the operation being done let him go to the Treasury Department, where he will see bonds canceled, destroyed, and burned. We have a statement of the public debt made under the highest sanction of law, made under the oaths of many officers. This statement, made in the ordinary course of official communication, published to the world and made monthly during the last six months, shows that from the 1st of July last our debt has decreased $8,856,531.05, or at the rate of over $17,000,000 a year. Do you not believe that? Do you pretend to say that document is not true? It is the strangest thing in the world that Senators should make such an assertion. There it is; and the statement gives the interest accrued up to the time that it was made and published, and no one has ever questioned the accuracy of this statement. Even last year during the stormy times, the hard times, the "hard year," as it was commonly called, we reduced the public debt $13,376,658. It is true we did not decrease it as much as we agreed to do, because we agreed to maintain a sinking fund of about $30,000,000, and we failed in that particular; but still the debt has been reduced every year. This republican administration, which now has the charge of the Government, paid off of the public debt in seven or eight years of its administration more than any government in the world ever undertook to pay off. We have reduced the public debt between four and five hundred million dollars by the application of the surplus revenue; and, sir, every year, even in these hard times, we are gradually reducing our public debt, until it has ceased to be a matter of alarm. Now, when it is said in the Senate of the United States that our debt is not diminishing, that these tables are not to be relied upon, and these words go out to add alarm to real distress, it seems to me it is time to check such things, if possible. Sir, the public debt is diminishing and will continue to diminish. It ought to diminish at the rate of thirty or thirty-one million dollars a year. That is not done, but still it is diminishing, and, I trust, will continue to diminish; and if gentlemen will carry out their pledges by striking off unreasonable expenditures, if there are any such, we shall reduce it more and more.

Now, sir, to show that affairs are improving rather than getting worse, I will refer to the fact that last year, when the estimates were made for the current fiscal year, the Secretary of the Treasury estimated the surplus during this year at about $9,000,000.

Mr. DAVIS. What report do you read from?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have before me the report of this year, and I will read:

> By reference to the last annual report, page 6, it will be observed that the estimate then made was that the revenues for this fiscal year would reach the sum of $284,318,285.99, and that the expenditures would amount to $275,315,489.42.

That would make a surplus revenue of $9,000,000 for the fiscal year which commenced last July and will end next June. A year ago the Secretary estimated that under existing laws the surplus would only be $9,000,000 during the whole year, and yet I show you, by the statement made on the 1st of January, that we have reduced the debt nearly $9,000,000 already in six months of the fiscal year, and the best six months of our revenue are yet to come, including the spring months. During the last month, which is the worst month in the year for the revenues and expenditures of the Government, our debt increased nearly two millions, and it is always so in December. A year ago it increased from three to four millions in the month of December. I have no doubt now—and I will venture this prophecy—that, instead of reducing the debt under existing laws $9,000,000, we shall, without any benefit from the proposed reduction of expenditures by the democratic party, have a surplus revenue of at least twenty or twenty-one million dollars under the present laws, based upon the present estimates of expenditure; and if gentlemen on both sides and all sides will join in an honest effort not to cripple the Government, not to destroy this branch or that branch of the service, but to make a practical reduction of public expenditures by sensible and practical economy, by stopping a leak here and stopping a leak there, cutting off an office here and an office there, we shall have a surplus revenue of $40,000,000 during the next fiscal year, and that $40,000,000 surplus revenue is more than enough, without any other agency or any other means, to enable us to carry out the promise we have made in regard to specie resumption.

Sir, we ought to take a hopeful view of things in this centennial year of our great country. Look at the aggregate of results. A century ago we were three million people; now forty millions; then we had a little border on the Atlantic; we are now extended to the Pacific. See what has been accomplished in a hundred years. During that time there have been periods of darkness and doubt. Every seven or ten or twelve years, periodically, there have been times of financial distress. We have lived through them all. I believe, and I trust in God, that this very year is the beginning of another period of prosperity, and that all these dark clouds, which gentlemen are trying to raise up from the misery of the past two or three years and from their own clouded imaginations, will entirely disappear. I believe that even now we are in the sunshine of increasing prosperity, and that every day and every hour will add to our wealth and relieve us from our distresses.

Sir, things are not so unhopeful as Senators seem to think. We have made a promise to be executed three years hence, and every step of our legislation, if any is had, should look in that direction. We may not adopt any measure or may not deem that any is necessary; but, if any be adopted, it ought to look to the execution of that promise, and we ought to enter on the performance of this duty with hopeful trust in the continued prosperity of our country. All this gloom and doubt, all this arraignment of official statements, this doubt of our sufficient revenues, this doubt of our ability to meet and advance our destiny, always falls upon my ear with painful surprise. Senators, the task we have before us may be a difficult one, as it has always proved to be difficult to resume the specie standard whenever for any reason a nation has fallen from it, but it is a duty that must be executed, and it ought to be executed without the spirit of party warfare, without these appeals directly or indirectly to party tactics. The pledges made one year ago, although not voted for by the democratic party, are pledges binding upon their honor and their faith as they are upon mine, and I trust in God that we shall join together in all the proper steps to carry out those pledges.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I do not wish to occupy time at this hour in the afternoon, but I think I ought to say a word in reply to my honorable friend from Connecticut, [MR. EATON,] who seems to imagine that I have taunted the democratic party in this body with voting against the bill for the resumption of specie payments. I did not intend to taunt them. They undoubtedly acted under a sense of duty. I supposed they were sincere in their votes and were against doing that thing.

Mr. President, I think there is another reason perhaps that might be stated why he should not have taunted me with that taunt, if it be one. The Senator must have forgotten that it was only last spring, since we passed this bill, that my friend from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] and my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] dismissed me from the republican party, not with their blessing even, on the Pinchback question, and he ought to have faith enough to suppose that I might speak a little independently just now. But, of course, we will not waste time in pleasantries on this occasion.

Mr. President, this question is a party question; it will be a party question, like every other great question that divides opinions among citizens in this country or any other. If this had not been a party question, when the act of 1875 passed we should have found some gentleman of the democratic party who thought he could see merit enough in the bill which we did pass to vote for it. When we get outside of the range of party questions, there is scarcely a question that does not on one side or the other receive votes of gentlemen of both parties. But there is a set of questions (and this is one of them) where, when the lines are drawn upon the yeas and nays, the parties vote very solid indeed. It cannot help being a party question, as I say, because we all know that opinions in this country differ; and whether you call it a democratic party question or a republican party question is perfectly immaterial. Everything will be a party question until, when one party brings in a bill as this that we passed was brought in, somebody can be found in the other party who will either vote for it or propose to amend it in some substantial way, providing another and a different scheme to accomplish the same object. Therefore I think I am justified in saying that, if our brothers on the other side of this Chamber had been in favor of resuming specie payments on the 1st of January, 1879, or earlier, they would have proposed a measure, taking different methods, if they did not like this, to reach that result; but they did not do it.

No, Mr. President, you cannot escape this being a party question. If my honorable friend thinks the democratic party are in favor of resuming specie payments, as he is, I think he will find, when it comes to the test, that that party occupies the same attitude that it was said to have done during the war against the rebellion: it was very much in favor of putting down the rebellion and very much opposed to taking any steps to do it.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, it is not necessary to answer that stale and miserable joke, the last remark of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] I should think the Senator, who is distinguished for his wit and the fertility of the brain, could do a little better than repeat the poor Joe Millerism of his party.

I have one word to say about this question of the resumption of specie payments being a party question. If the Senator means that the bill of last January was a party bill, I fully agree with his statement. For the first time, I think, in the history of this or any other government, a bill of so much moment, upon so important a question, never saw the light in the body that was to pass it until it was fully matured in the caucus of a party, and then it was brought forth from that caucus, laid upon our tables one day, printed, and taken up the next, and, before the sun sat, passed without one single word of discussion from the majority of the body by which it was passed, except, now and then, a statement extorted from the chairman of the Committee on Finance. Yes, sir, that was a party bill. It was a bill which we were never allowed on this side of the Chamber to consider, which the most of us, and perhaps every one of us but one —and I do not know that he is an exception—never saw until the very day it was taken up, and the very day upon which it was passed; a bill which received no discussion whatever from those who favored it, which they did not recommend to us by one single argument, or by any statement that would show how the bill would operate; a bill that went to the other House, where the previous question was moved, and not one word was allowed to be said in favor of or against the bill. That was a party measure; that was a caucus compromise of conflicting opinions; that was a bed made in which the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] and my friend from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] could lie down in a close and an amiable embrace. That was a party measure sure enough; and it does not become the Senator from Vermont to say that that creation of a caucus, that thing which was meant to bridge over the difficulties of the situation until after 1876, for the benefit and behoof of the republican party, was voted against by every democrat on this side of the Chamber. Yes, sir, it was; and I venture to say now that the men who voted against that bill are as true friends of a sound currency, and of a return to specie payments, as soon as it can be reasonably done, as is the Senator from Vermont or any of his associates on that side of the Chamber; and it will not do for him to say that because we do not swallow whole anything that a republican caucus may see fit to adopt, therefore we are opposed to a sound currency. That will not do at all, sir. There is no sound logic in any such proposition as that. The Senator's colleague brings in a bill to supplement this thing, this renowned specie payment act of January last, and which has proved to be precisely what it was said on this side of the Chamber it would prove to be, a bill to resume specie payment without one single reasonable, practical provision in it to achieve that purpose. What are we told now about this bill? It is not yet a year old, but the President tells us "you must supplement it;" the Secretary of the Treasury tells us "you must supplement it;" the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] the colleague of the Senator nearest me, says "you must supplement it," and he introduces a bill for that purpose. Every Senator says "you must supplement it." Every one acknowledges that it is insufficient, unless, indeed, my friend from Vermont, who sits nearest me, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] be an exception. He relies on the tremendous power which he finds vested in the Secretary of the Treasury to do whatever he pleases with the surplus revenue of the Government and with the credit of the Government; this despotic one-man-power in a subordinate officer of this Government; and unless he thinks that that is sufficient for all purposes, then I must say that no man pretends that the law of January last is a perfect law, and that it does not need amendment. Its insufficiency is acknowledged on all hands, by your President, by your Secretary of the Treasury, by Senators, and by Representatives. Everywhere it is acknowledged that the great thing is to find out how its defects shall be cured, how a better mode than is provided in that bill can be adopted to arrive at the result of a return to specie payments.

That is the great problem. It is a difficult one, as every man knows who has honestly tried to solve it, and no man is to be reproached because he cannot agree with the majority of the Senate in reference to this or to that particular measure for the purpose of resumption. Why, sir, take the very bill of January last. I venture to say—stating simply, of course, my opinion, for it is matter of opinion—that there is not one man on this floor who foresaw the practical effect of that bill. I believe that the inflation wing of the republican party thought they had whipped the hard-money wing in the caucus. I believe that the inflation wing of the republican party thought that the provision for issuing $5 in national-bank notes for $4 in greenbacks retired was inflation. They did not foresee that if that law went into effect the banks would find it to their interest to surrender their currency. They did not foresee that there would be surrendered up to the 1st of November in the past year $33,000,000 of bank currency. They did not foresee that if the banks became convinced that that law was to be rigidly executed, that it would be in no respect modified at all, in twelve months from this date the surrender of bank currency would reach more than $100,000,000 in all human probability. The inflationists in the republican caucus, I think, did not see that. They did not see it, or that bill never would have been born of that caucus, and there is no greater proof of the viciousness of such modes of legislation. No greater proof could be given of the unwisdom of preparing such a measure as this in a caucus, instead of subjecting it to the discussion of all parties in the Senate, than has been given by the history and practical working of this very same bill.

Sir, there are other matters connected with this bill that will require the attention of the Senator from Vermont when they come to be presented to the Senate, and which he cannot put down with a witticism, which he cannot put down by an accusation, but which he must consider, and which I know he will consider in the common interest of our common country.

But, sir, I am not going, as I said before, into a discussion of the financial question. In the remarks I first submitted I did not utter one word that had the least party bias in it or allusion to party in it; but my friend from Vermont saw fit to taunt us over here that we had voted against the bill, and to talk about his side of the Chamber as the true friends of resumption, as if we were shams and humbugs on this side. There never was a greater mistake in the world than to suppose that. It only proves that the Senator is not capable of forming a correct judgment at all. He saw fit to throw that in, and finally to make a most extraordinary confession; and that I want to put at him. Which is the truer friend of the resumption of specie payments—the Senator or myself? I am in favor of a resumption of specie payments in a reasonable time, and by a reasonable mode, and of seeing that it will have the effect. But the Senator says, if I understand him, that we cannot resume until the republican party appoints honest officers, who will collect the whisky tax. My God, sir, if that is the case, resumption of specie payments is postponed forever! [Laughter.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I am very sorry, and apologize for the Joe Millerism, because I see that it has touched my friend in a tender point.

Mr. THURMAN. That is a worse Joe Millerism than the other. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will remind the galleries that no disorder is tolerated by the rules of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not know that my chickens were going to roost in that quarter, or I should not have made any such remark. I had always supposed, of course, that my friend not only was vigorous in opinion for putting down the rebellion, but that he voted and fought for it on all occasions.

Mr. THURMAN. By proxy.

Mr. EDMUNDS. By proxy, of course. But we will leave that, Mr. President. The honorable Senator from Ohio seems to say that he did not vote for this bill a year ago, because, he says, it was born of a caucus. I do not know whether it was born of a caucus or not. I believe it was born of some good and patriotic impulse, and that it was designed, as it appears on its face, for what I believe to be a good and patriotic end. And, by the way, it is a little amusing that every time a broad measure, which looks toward doing something to get out of the difficulty we are in, is proposed we find our friends talking about caucuses, though, according to common report in parts of this Capitol and elsewhere, even the opposition is not in such a condition as to allow one of its members to blow his nose without they have a caucus upon it. They cannot distribute the smallest offices or do anything, in a certain place where recently they have come into power, without the solemn conclave of a caucus, if common report is true; and I have seen it stated in a newspaper, and I believe truly, that it is under serious consideration whether everything that one branch of this Government is to do of all kinds is not first to be submitted to a junta appointed by a caucus, to deal out to the faithful the measures and the men they shall go for and appoint from beginning to end. But here is the great head of the party in this Chamber preaching long homilies to us about caucus consideration of a great public measure. I leave that, Mr. President, to all my friend can make out of it.

But we come back again to the question that is thus opened here: what is the attitude of that honorable party that voted against this bill that was passed? Have you found out from the remarks of their acknowledged leader? Do you know where he is and what he is for? No. He says he is in favor of resuming specie payments in a reasonable time and in a reasonable way. Will that satisfy the people of the United States, Mr. President? Will it satisfy anybody? Here was this measure, proposed if you please by the republican party, which received, I believe, the vote of every Senator of that party. It was not forced through this body. There is no such thing as forcing a measure through this body. It was open to inspection; it was open to criticism; it was open to debate; it was open to every species of amendment. If the democratic party had any policy, or measure, or idea on the subject that they were willing to put forward to the world, why, in the name of all that is reasonable, did they not propose a good measure as an amendment to that? Ah, no, Mr. President; it is best to keep in the dark or to say "no."

Sir, I do not believe people can be deceived by that kind of talk. This saying that we are in favor of doing something at a reasonable time and in a reasonable way, and never making any proposition or taking any step, where debate is free and every species of amendment is open, will not go down with the intelligent citizens of this country. The Senator says that the majority did not debate it. We did not need to. It speaks for itself; there is no misunderstanding it, and it is not so long as to require explanation of details. It is a simple proposition pledging the faith of the Government that we will do by a certain time a thing which we ought to have done long ago, and authorizing the only officer of the Government that ever has been authorized to take steps on this subject to take the necessary measures to do it.

The Senator speaks of "one-man power" as given to the Secretary of the Treasury. How does he propose to redeem? That every Senator shall be authorized and required to redeem whenever anybody presents money to him? He must delegate this power to and impose this duty upon somebody. Has he any fault to find with the officer upon whom this bill devolves it? I take it not. That is a flourish of speech. No, Mr. President, we cannot disguise this business. If men are in favor of specie payments, if they do not like one measure that is proposed, they must propose another or people will not believe that they are.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I do not rise for the purpose of saying a word upon this financial question, which of course I understand thoroughly, like every other citizen of the United States; but I rise to repel an accusation preferred against me by my friend from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] the gravest I think ever made against me in my short life. In these days of universal villification and crimination I should not take any notice of an ordinary accusation. If I was charged with anything like arson, or robbery, or burglary, I would let it pass; but I understand the Senator to have informed the Senate and the country that something like a year ago I dismissed him from the republican party. Now, that is too grave an offense to impute to me, and I cannot consent to let that go to the country, in connection with the very excellent and very sound republicanism which the Senator has uttered here this afternoon, without a plain, flat contradiction. I therefore undertake to say for the satisfaction of the country that I never did dismiss the Senator from the republican party. I know it for two reasons: first, I know I never had the power to do anything of the kind; and, secondly, because, if I had ever been clothed with the most absolute power in that behalf, I know of a great many men in the United States that I should dismiss from the republican party before I should the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall consider myself back again.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, this financial debate is ill-omened. The tone of the speeches we have just heard from leading members of the Administration party in the Senate, and they who have the control of the business of this body, and whose party has had the control of the business of the country in both Houses of Congress, is not, I fear, very hopeful for a proper settlement of this question. There is scarcely a Senator among us who did not come to the present meeting of Congress heavily burdened with the consideration of this question and the great difficulties that surround us. The distresses from which the people of this country to-day are suffering are greater, I believe, than at any former period of their history. I believe there is a more fearful proportion of debt to property than ever before in the history of this country. I believe the American people never were so poor as now; and they have been made poor, in part, by having the truth kept from them by trumpetings of false prosperity, such as we have just listened to, and which we have heard for these last ten years in Congress from the leaders of the party who now see fit to assail the minority in this Chamber for want of fidelity to sound financial principles.

Now, Mr. President, there is but one way in which this country and its people can be extricated. It is not by crimination or recrimination as to who or what caused our present distress, but by a hearty, kindly, united feeling among right-minded men of all parties to redeem the standard of the national currency and to regard sedulously every pledge of the public faith. And how is this to be gone about? Is it by such narrow party flings as the Senator from Vermont has just indulged in? By intimating that members of the minority in this Chamber will make professions of their desire for a sound currency or a restoration of specie payments and then vote against every measure that leads to it? Why, sir, the charge is so absurd as to be scarcely worth while to refute. To my ear it sounds strangely. I was assigned by the pleasure of the Senate to a place on the Committee on Finance in 1869, and every vote and every measure that tended to specie payments has had my hearty concurrence; and the many attempts that I have made directly to reach it have been put down either in committee or on the floor of the Senate by the vote of the majority.

As to this miserable sham of last year called a bill to resume specie payments, a bill "how not to do it," a bill that was a mere party-caucus measure, that never was suffered to undergo public debate, a bill that meant anything to please any man, no matter what view he might take of it, a bill which we saw professed specie-payment men rushing to vote for and then saw the professed and avowed inflationists at the same time voting for. What did it mean? It meant nothing but a party coalition for a party end. It was not treating a great subject of profound national interest in a respectful way. It was in name only "a measure to resume specie payments," when the chairman who introduced it did not venture to give his own opinions on the subject of the bill and could not give plain answers to plain questions when they were asked in open Senate. It depended not at all upon the provisions of the bill, but upon the personal opinions and action of the Secretary of the Treasury. His views on finance, I believe, were sound. He was in favor of what must precede specie payments—contraction of the volume of the currency. And so he has acted upon such a construction of the bill that when greenback notes were retired in the ratio of 80 per cent. of the national-bank notes issued, they should not be re-issued again by him again to swell the volume. Upon that view he has acted; and yet, when the question was asked as to what his power was, when it was asked of the chairman of the Committee on Finance whether it would or would not be done, he said he could not tell. He sat here unwilling to bind the Administration or his party to any construction of the bill, and could give no answer and left gentlemen to make what construction they pleased. It was to be a measure of inflation to suit inflationists, and it was to be a measure of contraction to suit the contractionists.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to ask my friend from Delaware, in respect of this redemption and extinguishment of greenbacks that have been redeemed by the Secretary of the Treasury, whether, in his opinion, the construction that the Secretary of the Treasury has put upon the bill is not the true one?

Mr. BAYARD. I do not know whether the language of that law can be so correctly construed or not. I only express my great satisfaction that he is acting under such a construction. But I do mean to say that the law is open equally to an opposite construction.

Mr. EDMUNDS. O, no.

Mr. BAYARD. And as the President of the United States in the origin of his administration of this Government's affairs chose first for Secretary of the Treasury a gentleman of well-known and decided financial views one day and the next chose another almost his direct opposite in matters of revenue and finance, it may perfectly well be that, if the country shall be unfortunate enough to lose Mr. Bristow's services as Secretary of the Treasury, we may have him replaced by some inflationist, who would have equal law to sustain him.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust my friend from Delaware will allow me to correct a mistake that I think he has fallen into through perhaps a misapprehension. I remember very well that he or some one put to me the question whether the notes that were redeemed in the process of redemption down to the $300,000,000 could be re-issued, and I answered distinctly and definitely that they could not be re-issued. The law was perfectly plain on that subject. Then gentlemen pressed me on another point, whether, after the reduction had been actually accomplished, after the 1st of January, 1879, then the notes that were redeemed in the ordinary course of the operations of the Treasury Department could be re-issued. I declined to answer, because there was a difference of opinion about it; but if the Senator will look at the RECORD he will find that I specifically answered the question he now says I did not answer. He is in error in regard to that. I said specifically that there could be no question under the first section of the bill; that in the process of reducing the greenbacks down to three hundred millions the notes redeemed could not be reissued. They were to be canceled and retired.

Mr. BAYARD. The record of the debate of last January will speak for itself, and it will do the honorable Senator justice. Certainly I am not disposed to do him injustice; but I will refer him now to the fact that I asked him, in open Senate, whether he would permit the word "destroyed" to be interpolated in that bill, so as to prevent the possibility of the construction which the Senator from Vermont says now cannot be put upon it, saying at the time that I would vote for the bill if I could be shown that the 80 per cent. of the greenbacks which were to be retired upon the issue of 100 per cent. of national-bank currency under that bill should be destroyed when they were retired, and we should not have this wretched business played over again that we had witnessed under the act of 1868—the careful contracting of $28,000,000 of Treasury notes—and then having it rushed out again without law, to swell the volume of currency, and in one month to do away with all the savings of some six years. When I asked whether a single word could be interpolated in the bill, and offered to give my consent and vote for the bill if it should be, the Senator distinctly declined to allow the word to be put in. There was not an amendment of any kind permitted. There were, I believe, amendments offered, but all rejected. I mean to say plainly, from first to last, it has been and is my object to restore the currency of this country to a specie basis; that directly and indirectly, at all times, I have anxiously endeavored to effect that object, never withholding a vote that would do it, made every motion that would help it, both in committee and in the Senate; and therefore it is that I resent the injustice, coming from any Senator, of a suggestion that there has been a profession simply, and not a profession backed by practice, by the democratic party in regard to a restoration of sound finance to the country.

But, Mr. President, I did not rise to prolong this debate, or, indeed, to take any part in it, but to express the sense of deep regret that I have in seeing so great a question as this approached in the temper in which it has been by some of the leaders on the other side. This country is in great trouble. It will need all the ability, and all the honesty, and all the integrity and intelligence our people or their representatives possess, to bring us into an honorable prosperity; and, surely, we are not to be furthered in such an object by treating such a subject and so high a duty in a petty partisan spirit and tone of discussion. That man is a foe to the public credit who endeavors to make either the people of this country or the people of other countries, who are our creditors, believe that there exists a great party in the United States opposed to sound finance, and therefore tending to the risks of repudiation.

No, sir; I will give credit to any man who furthers sound finance. will aid him, if I can, so far as I may; but I do say that a most fatal step is to degrade the subject by treating it as a mere party measure and legislating in regard to it upon mere party feeling. I had hoped that at this session there would be a better, a more worthy mode of approaching the subject than was done by this wretched, tricky measure of January last—a measure that is admitted to be utterly incompetent to produce any good results, a measure that every department of the Government declares must undergo important amendments in order to make it efficient; and instead of approaching this measure as we should do, the very first echoes in this Chamber, on the opening of the debate, are an unwarranted assault on party faith; and even more than party faith, upon personal faith.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I inquire who admits that the act of January, 1875, is perfectly incompent to accomplish the end?

Mr. BAYARD. I thought that every sensible man admitted it. I did not know that, after the experience of the last twelve months, anybody would be found who would say that the act of 1875 was not a sham upon its face as it stood, perfectly inefficient to produce the result which its title proclaimed. It is a bill calling for specie payments in 1879 and taking no step for it, but on the contrary long steps away from it. Its practical effect has been different from that which may have been augured from its language. Its practical effect has been produced by the judicious and wholesome manner in which the law has been construed and administered by the present Secretary of the Treasury, but it is the mere accident of his personal opinions on the subject and of his personal conduct. Death or other cause might remove him from office, and then our chances would be whether the gentleman who succeeded him in office held the hard-money views of Mr. Bristow or whether he held the soft-money views of Mr. Somebody else.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator says he supposed every sensible man admitted that this act of 1875 was wholly incompetent to the end in view. I must suppose that he speaks for himself, because I believe him to be a sensible man, but I do not know anybody else who has admitted anything of the kind. On the contrary, I know of a great many men who pass for sensible, a considerable majority of the members of this body, who believe now, as they believed then, that instead of being perfectly incompetent to that end it was a competent and wise measure to that end; one that, if it was not supplemented by any legislation at all, would accomplish it; and it will.

Mr. SHERMAN. So the Secretary says.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And so the Secretary says. I think the Senator from Delaware believes the Secretary to be a sensible man. He has said so in this very debate. No, Mr. President, it will not do for my friend, if I may allude to him, or for any Senator, to whatever party he belongs, to undertake to damn this measure that has already become a law in spite of their votes. Of course in a political point of view—I cannot suppose it has any party view—it would be rather the thing for the democratic party now to cry "No eggs in that basket," and to make as many simple people as possible believe that the legislation which we had effected against their votes was not really a substantial and valuable step to the end that they believe themselves to have in view, although taking the results in the State of my friend from Ohio who sits furthest from me as a guide I could suppose they had not. However, I did not rise to prolong this debate, but to ascertain who it is that admits such a proposition.

Mr. SHERMAN. In the face of the declaration made by the Senator from Delaware, and to let this matter stand right in the presence of the Senate, I will read, and confine myself to reading, what the Secretary of the Treasury says as to this act; and the Senator will find that the Secretary, whom he eulogizes, places a very different estimate upon it. I read from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. BOGY. What page?

Mr. SHERMAN. Page 20. The Secretary says:

> The faith of the Government now stands pledged to resumption on and after January 1, 1879, and to the final redemption and removal from the currency of the country of the legal-tender notes as fast as they shall be presented for redemption, according to the provisions of the act of January 14, 1875. To resume on the 1st of January, 1879, without further legislation, would require the accumulation of a large amount of gold in the Treasury, in order to avert the possibility of failure of the plan. Such an amount of gold can be procured with difficulty, and not without more or less embarrassing effect upon the trade and commerce of our own and other countries. The present abundance and cheapness of both currency and capital present a favorable opportunity for the withdrawal and redemption of a considerable part of the outstanding legal-tender notes, thereby making easy and effectual the redemption now pledged. Such withdrawal of legal-tender notes, thus dispensing with the necessity for accumulating gold in the Treasury in proportion to the amount withdrawn, would tend to appreciate those remaining outstanding, and make it easier to protect and keep in circulation the silver coin now authorized to be issued.
> The act last referred to is an express recognition of the duty and obligation of the Government to resume specie payment at the day therein named; and, however widely different may be the views of intelligent persons upon the means adopted by Congress, it is gratifying to know that the end sought to be reached has met the concurrence of the country, and that a majority of the people, wherever the matter has been publicly and fully discussed, have signified their approval of the determination of Congress to be faithful to its pledges and to relieve them of the ills of an irredeemable paper currency.
> The act in question not only makes express provision for resumption at a fixed date, but commits the Government to the use of all such means as may be needful to that end.

So that the Secretary not only says that the act can be executed, but that it will require a large accumulation of gold as the time approaches; and to remove the necessity of that large accumulation he asks that a portion of the greenbacks may be periodically retired. That is the criticism of the Secretary upon the law; very different indeed from the opinion expressed by my colleague and by the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. BAYARD. Just so, Mr. President. The Secretary of the Treasury finds that the law as it stands will not enable the Treasury to resume specie payment by 1879, and therefore he wants amendments made to make such result practicable. But I do not propose to discuss this enactment of 1875 now. I presume it will come before us hereafter, and I do not care to prolong this debate; but if any man can show how we may return to specie payments otherwise than by a contraction of the volume of the currency, then he will show me something that I never yet have been able to see; and when you show me a bill which provides for the issuing of currency to the national banks ad libitum, and only the retiring of 80 per cent. of that which now exists, and that only to a fixed minimum of $300,000,000, I must regard that as a measure of expansion, which makes specie payments every day more impossible, provided you carry out the present law according to its letter; and for that reason I regard the act of January, 1875, as a sham, and that resumption under its provisions is an impossibility.

Mr. BOGY. I will detain the Senate but a moment. In reading the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, I came to the conclusion that he was of opinion that this law would not be sufficient to resume specie payment, and I will read from page 21 of the report. The Secretary says:

> It may, perhaps, be doubted whether the process of accumulating a large amount of gold by a given time could go on without meeting opposition from the financial powers of the world. It is safe to say that so large an amount of gold as would be required to carry out the purpose and direction of the act cannot be suddenly acquired. It can be done only by gradual processes, and by taking advantage of favorable conditions of the money market from time to time.

That being so, the bill not providing in that way, it is perfectly plain that the bill, as it stands now, would not be sufficient to effect the purpose.

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill authorizes the accumulation of coin between now and the time. That is precisely what the bill does do.

Mr. BOGY. The Secretary here proposes an amendment to the bill, which the Senator calls supplemental, with a view of effecting the object; but the bill, as it stands now, will not accumulate gold sufficient to effect the purpose. The whole tenor of the report, when well analyzed, according to my reading, is simply this: that the bill by itself will not accomplish that purpose.

In answer to the remarks made by the Senator from Ohio awhile ago as to the surplus revenue, I say now, as I said then, that there is no surplus revenue. It is true that in the estimate made by the Secretary the debt appears to have decreased, and no doubt is decreased to the amount of $8,000,000. I do not doubt the correctness of that statement as far as it goes. But I do know that the accumulation of the revenue of the Government through the customs amounts to only $157,000,000, being a very large diminution; that the internal revenue amounts to only about $110,000,000, which is also a diminution, and which has much diminished since the frauds have been exposed in the Western States, in Milwaukee, Chicago, and Saint Louis—diminished to the amount of many millions. We diminish the revenue and do not diminish the appropriations, and where do you get your surplus? We were told last year by the Secretary of the Treasury that there would be an excess of $9,000,000, and this has been referred to by the Senator from Ohio. The Secretary said in his report at the beginning of the last session that there would be an excess of $9,000,000. In less than thirty days we were called upon to increase the tariff, which we did by restoring the 10 per cent. diminution which had been taken away a year or two before, by increasing the tax upon whisky from seventy to ninety cents a gallon and by increasing the tax upon tobacco. We were told then that it was an absolute necessity to do so, otherwise there would not be a sufficient accumulation to meet the needs of the sinking fund. Yet a short time before we were told that there would be an excess of revenue. So it will appear now, and so we shall be called upon to provide additional means of revenue to meet the expenses of the Government.

Mr. President, I do not wish to discuss the subject at length. I am willing that the bill shall be referred to the Committee on Finance, believing, however, that this discussion has done some good.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and fifty-nine minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 6, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CORRECTION.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. On yesterday I offered a joint resolution relating to the Centennial. It is stated here in the RECORD that it was a joint resolution of the Legislature of New Jersey. I desire to have that correction made. Also upon the vote on the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] I am reported as absent. I was present and voted against the reference of the resolution to the Centennial Committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that the correction has already been made in the RECORD and the Journal.

The morning hour begins at twenty-three minutes before one o'clock, and the first business in order is the call of committees for reports.

PAY AND ALLOWANCES OF ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. RANDALL. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to report the following resolution, and move its reference to the Committee on Military Affairs:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be requested to take into immediate consideration the pay and allowances of the officers of the Army, and to report at the earliest practicable day whether in any and what cases said pay and allowances should be reduced.

It is proper for me to say in this connection that while the Committee on Appropriations are in favor of reducing the expenses of the Government as far as possible consistent with entire justice to all the branches of the Government, it is not their wish in the least degree to interfere with any business of the House which may properly belong to other committees. I can say, therefore, that wherever the Committee on Appropriations may desire to reduce or to change in any degree the pay or the number of employés of the Government, they will do so only after the fullest conference with the various committees of the House having charge of those subjects. I introduce this resolution by instruction of the Committee on Appropriations for reference only, that being considered the most proper mode of reaching the result in view.

The resolution was received, read, and adopted.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I desire to ask unanimous consent of the House to make an explanation in relation to a matter in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order during the morning hour, but the Chair will entertain the request of the gentleman when it will be in order. The business now in order is reports from committees.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

Mr. HOPKINS. I am instructed by the Committee on the Centennial Celebration to report the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk, accompanied by a report in writing, and to move that the bill and report be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I desire also to give notice that on Monday next, after the morning hour, I will move that the House proceed to the consideration of this bill.

The bill (H. R. No. 514) relating to the centennial celebration of American independence was then read a first and second time.

Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. FORT asked that the bill be read in full.

The preamble of the bill states that by an act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for the celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of American independence by holding an international exposition of arts, manufactures, and products of the soil and mines in the city of Philadelphia and State of Pennsylvania in 1876," approved March 3, 1871, provision was made for the celebration of the centennial anniversary of the Declaration of American Independence by an exhibition of American and foreign arts, products, and manufactures, to be held under the auspices of the Government of the United States, in the city of Philadelphia, in the year 1876; that by an act of Congress entitled "An act relative to the centennial international exhibition to be held in the city of Philadelphia, State of Pennsylvania, in the year 1876," approved June 1, 1872, the centennial board of finance was incorporated, with authority to raise the capital necessary to carry into effect the provisions of the said act of March 3, 1871; that the President of the United States, in compliance with a joint resolution of Congress approved June 5, 1874, did extend, in the name of the United States, a respectful and cordial invitation to the governments of other nations to be represented and to take part in the international exposition to be held at Philadelphia under the auspices of the Government of the United States, and the governments so invited, to the number of thirty-eight, have accepted such invitation, and many of them are making extensive preparations to embrace the courtesies so extended to them, thereby rendering proper arrangements for the coming ceremonies on the part of the Government of the United States a matter of honor and good faith; and that the preparations designed by the United States Centennial Commission, and in part accepted by the centennial board of finance, are in accordance with the spirit of acts of Congress relating thereto, and are on a scale creditable to the Government and people of the United States.

The bill appropriates the sum of $1,500,000 for completing the centennial buildings and other preparations, which shall be paid on the drafts of the president and treasurer of the centennial board of finance, one-third immediately after the passage of the act and the remaining two-thirds in four equal monthly parts, provided that in the distribution of any moneys that may remain in the treasury of the centennial board of finance after the payments of its debts, as provided for by the tenth section of the act of Congress, and approved June 1, 1872, incorporating said centennial board of finance, the appropriation herein made shall share equally with the holders of the said centennial stock, and the like percentage be paid into the Treasury of the United States as may be paid to the holders of said stock; and provided further that the Government of the United States shall under no circumstance be liable for any debt or obligation of the United States Centennial Commission or centennial board of finance, or any payment in addition to the foregoing sum.

The bill with the accompanying report was ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe that under the rules this bill cannot be brought back into the House on a motion to reconsider. If it can be, I will make a motion to reconsider the vote referring it to the Committee of the Whole, and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. RANDALL. It is not the intention at all to bring this bill into the House on a motion to reconsider; though the motion of the gentleman from Indiana is a very proper one to be made.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The call of committees for reports having been concluded, the next business in order during the morning hour is the calling of States and Territories for resolutions, under which call bills may be introduced on leave for reference.

RESTORATION OF FRATERNAL FEELING.

Mr. NEW submitted the following resolution, on which he called the previous question:

Resolved, That the fraternal feeling and good-will now existing in all sections of the United States, and the manifest disposition and purpose of the men who battled against each other, in the late civil war, to join hands as one people in the future is a most auspicious ushering in of the centennial year; and while the people are thus making an honest effort to live together in peace and uphold the same flag for an undivided country, their representatives in Congress should do no act which will unnecessarily disturb the patriotic concord now existing and increasing, or wantonly revive the bitter memories of the past.

Mr. KASSON. I rise to a point of order. Yesterday a good many of the States were not called; and a number of gentlemen are now waiting for an opportunity to introduce bills. I submit that Indiana had been called yesterday and is not now in order to be called. Am I right?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's point would have been good if he had made it a little earlier. But the resolution has been received and read.

Mr. KASSON. I waited to hear what the proposition was before I objected. I will not insist on my point if the gentleman desires action on this resolution now; but I desire very much that the call of States for the introduction of bills, &c., shall be resumed.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us adopt this resolution, and then we can proceed as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] suggests.

Mr. KASSON. I give notice that I shall call for the regular order as soon as this resolution is disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will enforce the regular order after the House has disposed of this resolution. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NEW] demands the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question being on the adoption of the resolution,

Mr. NEW called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KASSON. I appeal to the gentleman from Indiana to ascertain, before the roll be called, whether the House is not unanimous in favor of the resolution. If it is, we may save time by dispensing with the yeas and nays.

Mr. NEW. I am not free from doubt as to whether the House is unanimous. I hope it may so transpire.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 248, nays 0, not voting 43; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Ainsworth, Anderson, Ashe, Atkins, Bagby, George A. Bagley, John H. Bagley, jr., John H. Baker, William H. So the resolution was unanimously adopted.

UNION SOLDIERS IN THE EMPLOY OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. FORT. I offer the following resolution, on which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That in consideration of the existence of the auspicious harmony expressed in the resolution of the gentleman from Indiana, just passed, wounded Union soldiers ought not to be removed from positions in this House which they may be qualified to fill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. CLYMER.) This same resolution, substantially, has already been offered during this call by the same gentleman.

Mr. FORT. I do not understand the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman has already introduced a resolution under this call, and has no right to offer another.

Mr. FORT. I have offered no such resolution as this.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair decides the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] not to be in order for the reason that he has heretofore on this call offered a resolution, whereby his privilege was exhausted. As an additional reason, it may be stated that the resolution offered by him yesterday on this same call was almost identical with the one he now proposes, that the House by a yea and nay vote referred it to the Committee on the Centennial, before which it is now pending.

SARAH E. GARLAND AND F. M. HOPPIN.

Mr. SPRINGER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 515) for the relief of Sarah A. Garland and Frank M. Hoppin; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

FLOYD C. BABCOCK.

Mr. STEVENSON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 516) for the relief of Floyd C. Babcock, formerly a deputy United States marshal in the Indian country; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

J. W. PARISH & CO.

Mr. STEVENSON also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 517) for the relief of J. W. Parish & Co., of Illinois; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

IMPROVEMENT OF MISSOURI RIVER.

Mr. BUCKNER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 518) for the improvement of the Missouri River between the city of Saint Charles, in the State of Missouri, to its mouth; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

REDUCTION OF TAX ON TOBACCO.

Mr. BUCKNER also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 519) to impose a tax on sales of stocks and bonds and to reduce the tax on tobacco; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

SHARE-HOLDERS IN NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. BUCKNER also submitted the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to furnish to this House a copy of the lists required to be filed in the office of the Comptroller of the Currency under the provisions of section 5210 of the Revised Statutes, showing the names and residences of all share-holders in national-bank associations, and the number of shares held by each on the first Monday of July last.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. BUCKNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RELIEF OF TOBACCO-GROWERS.

Mr. HATCHER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 520) for the relief of tobacco-growers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

M. M. LYNCH.

Mr. HATCHER also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 521) for the relief of M. M. Lynch, of Washington County, Missouri; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

TAX ON FERMENTED, OR MALT LIQUORS.

Mr. KEHR introduced a bill (H. R. No. 522) to define the tax on fermented, or malt liquors; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

FOREIGN-BUILT VESSELS BELONGING TO UNITED STATES CITIZENS.

Mr. KEHR also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 523) authorizing vessels built abroad, but belonging wholly to citizens of the United States, to be registered as vessels of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

CUSTOM-HOUSES WHICH DO NOT PAY EXPENSES.

Mr. DE BOLT submitted the following resolution; on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury, in his reply to the resolution of this House introduced by Mr. HOPKINS on December 15, 1875, be, and is hereby, requested to furnish the House of Representatives with the following additional information, to wit: The points and location of all ports of entry, ports of delivery, and custom-houses of the United States the collections of which for the year last past do not amount to sufficient to defray the expenses of the same; the amount of goods examined and collections made at each of the several points named; together with the number, salary, and compensation otherwise received by each officer and employé thereof.

Mr. CONGER. I suggest to the gentleman to say "fiscal year last past."

Mr. DE BOLT. I accept the modification of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution, as modified, was adopted.

Mr. DE BOLT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

W. W. WALDEN.

Mr. DE BOLT also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 524) to pay W. W. Walden for buildings destroyed by fire while occupied by United States soldiers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

BOUNTY.

Mr. DE BOLT also introduced a bill (H. R. INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. WILSHIRE submitted the following preamble and resolution, upon which he called the previous question:

Whereas there have been made, through the public press and by individuals, numerous complaints and serious charges as to the manner in which the Indian affairs of the Government have been conducted in the past years; and whereas it has been charged, and by many believed, that in the distribution of the annuities and supplies to the several tribes of Indians authorized to be furnished by Congress great frauds upon the Government and wrongs to the Indians have been perpetrated by the officers, agents, and contractors of the Government; and whereas large sums of money have heretofore been appropriated by Congress for the purpose of civilizing and educating certain Indian tribes, which, it is believed, have been misapplied and injudiciously used, and as used, instead of serving the purpose for which such appropriations were made have only tended to encourage idleness among the Indians and render them more dissolute and barbarous than before; and whereas large claims are continually being presented to Congress, growing out of the mismanagement of the various Indian agencies by contractors and others; and whereas a full and correct knowledge of all the transactions of the Indian Department of the Government and the conduct of the officers and agents thereof is necessary to enable the Committee on Indian Affairs to report and this House to determine what action, if any, may be required to correct the existing evils, and to provide a more just and economical system of managing the Indian affairs of the Government: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs, or a subcommittee of the same, be authorized and directed to investigate the effect and operations of the treaties heretofore made with any of the Indian tribes and the conduct of any officer, agent, commissioner, or contractor of the Government in any way connected with the Indian Department for furnishing and distributing supplies to any Indian tribe or disbursing funds appropriated by Congress for the purpose of civilizing and educating certain Indians, and to inquire into the origin and validity of any claim presented or that may be presented to Congress, growing out of Indian affairs, and to report to this House at as early a day as practicable; and to that end such committee shall be authorized to send for persons and papers.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. WILSHIRE.] I presume he will find no objection at all to his resolution. But I ask him not to require the House to say, as he does in the preamble of the resolution, that the policy adopted for civilizing these people is one that is ruining the morals of the people and that the money is being squandered. That is a thing to be found out; if it be so, let us find it out. If the gentleman will modify his preamble and say that it is so alleged, I think there will be no objection to it.

Mr. WILSHIRE. To accommodate the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] I will subsitute "it is alleged" for "it is believed."

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the preamble, as modified, and the resolution were adopted.

First. That the words "and direct taxes," where they occur in the first line of clause 3, section 2, article 1, of the Constitution, be striken out.

Second. That the following words be added to the end of clause 1, section 8 of article 1, of the Constitution: "And direct taxes, when levied by the United States, shall be apportioned between the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia in proportion to the value of the property in each, and each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia shall have the right to collect its portion of the same, if it elect to do so, by its own officers, and from subjects of taxation provided by its own laws, and pay the same over to the United States, as may be provided by law. And on the refusal or failure of any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia to collect and pay over its portion of any of such tax, the same shall be collected as may be provided by the laws of the United States."

E. J. GORLEY.

Mr. MILLS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 593) for the relief of E. J. Gorley, of McLennan County, Texas; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the portion of the President's message which refers to the inroads, robberies, and murders along the Mexican border, in Texas, be referred to a special committee of five members, with instructions to inquire into the cause and the nature and extent of those depredations, and the measures that might prevent their continuance, and to report at as early a day as practicable.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the gentleman demand the previous question on the resolution?

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I do not demand the previous question for the reason that it is necessary to explain the object of the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can only debate by unanimous consent. If there is no objection the gentleman will be allowed to proceed. The Chair hears none.

Mr SCHLEICHER. By the action of the House of yesterday, adopting the report of the Committee on Ways and Means, the matters relating to the troubles on the Mexican frontier have been referred to two committees; a portion to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and another portion to the Committee on Military Affairs. There are, it is true, connected with this subject matters that go before the Committee on Military Affairs properly and also such as go to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. But besides such matters as go to these committees there are others that would not properly come before either of them. These disturbances in Texas have a long history, beginning as far back as 1858. The people there have had to take action themselves. There are matters which do not properly belong to either of the committees. Then, if the matter is referred to several committees, the Representatives from Texas will be under the necessity of taking their evidence before two or three different committees. It subdivides what is hardly capable of subdivision. Then, too, the measures recommended by these committees might be clashing. I think the House can readily see that it would be much more proper to have a committee appointed especially for this purpose, which can take cognizance of the whole and every portion of the subjects belonging to this question and every branch of it; and therefore I propose that a special committee of five be appointed, although I have no special preference as to the number of the committee, and if the House prefer a larger number I am perfectly willing.

Mr. MILLS. I would suggest to my colleague that he amend the resolution so as to give the committee power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I will accept the suggestion.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not wish to antagonize a proposition coming from the State especially interested in this subject, but it seems to me that this subject ought to go to one of the standing committees of the House. The Committee on Military Affairs seems to me to be the most appropriate committee. That committee can be invested with all the powers with which the gentleman contemplates investing this committee. It is certainly not a desirable policy to increase the number of the committees of the House. I therefore feel constrained to make a motion that the subject be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. If hereafter it shall be found desirable, on account of the duties of the Committee on Military Affairs, that a special committee should be organized, there will be time perhaps sufficient for that purpose.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. This question of the disturbances on our southern border, as presented to the House, has two aspects. It relates to a frontier bordering on a friendly nation with which we have diplomatic relations. It also presents itself in a military aspect, in reference to the suppression of certain outrages, which can only be accomplished by the military power; and we have referred, as was said by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. SCHLEICHER,] a portion to the Committee on Military Affairs and a portion to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Now, it is quite impossible that these two committees can jointly consider any question of this character, and I therefore agree with the gentleman from Texas that it presents itself in such a peculiar aspect, that it should be referred to a special committee to consider the whole question, and report what remedy Congress can devise in the premises. I trust therefore that the proposition of the gentleman from Texas will be adopted.

Mr. REAGAN. It is known to the country that considerable disturbances have existed upon the Mexican border along the Rio Grande for some years past. From the nature and character of those disturbances, if not prevented and arrested, we cannot tell but they may lead to serious international trouble. It is a subject which, as suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] would naturally fall within the scope and consideration partly of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and partly of the Committee on Military Affairs.

These disturbances are of a character and an extent that deserve the consideration of this Congress, if it wishes to give protection to the people of that border and to prevent the danger of a collision between the Governments of the United States and of Mexico, or at least between the people of Texas and of Mexico. We have the assurance of the governor of that State that if measures cannot be adopted which will be effective in preventing the continuance of these border disturbances that are continually occurring there, preventing the murders and robberies that are occurring there every week, and that have occurred to such an extent as to nearly devastate the country along the line of the Rio Grande—if that is not done he will be unable to restrain the people much longer from attempting to vindicate their own rights and to secure by their own arms their own protection. And this would be greatly to be deplored, for the State of Texas has not sufficient finances to undertake, without great injustice to the State, the defense of the people and property along that extended border.

Taking into consideration the danger of international complication, taking into consideration the extent and alarming character of the depredations upon that border, it seems to me that some committee ought to be charged with the consideration of the whole question of what provision should be made by Congress to alleviate the troubles of that section of our country. By the appointment of a select committee, as suggested by my colleague [Mr. SCHLEICHER,] the whole question can be considered in all its aspects, in its foreign aspect, in its military aspect, and with reference to the spoliations and depredations upon our people. And that committee will be able to recommend to the House such measures as may meet the necessities of the case and as may form a proper predicate for the action of the regular committees, if it shall be made to appear that that action is required.

I trust, therefore, that, in view of the important questions arising out of the condition of that frontier, the House will consent to the appointment of a select committee for the purpose of considering this whole subject and of pointing out the mode of giving security and peace to the people there, and to avert war between the two countries.

Mr. HANCOCK. I do not feel that I can add anything to what my colleagues [Mr. REAGAN and Mr. SCHLEICHER] have said, except in one point of view. I would like to be a little more explicit as to the necessity of some action as probably may not be taken by either of the committees to which has been referred that portion of the President's message relating to the condition of affairs on our Mexican frontier.

It is a subject that must be considered in somewhat of a duplex aspect. The President alludes to the fact of the insufficient means in his power to give that protection which the citizens may rightly look to this Government to afford them. He also refers to conditions existing on the other side of the Rio Grande River, caused by legislation and orders of the federal government of the Republic of Mexico, which are exceedingly detrimental to the revenue interests of this country, and may contribute very largely to the disturbed condition that exists there at the present time, and which has existed there for a considerable time in an aggravated form, ever since the Zona Libre, or Free Zone, has been established.

Now, to go properly into this investigation will require an enlargement of powers that neither the Committee on Military Affairs nor the Committee on Foreign Affairs can properly exercise, and would seem to justify the raising of a special committee as asked for by my colleague, [Mr. SCHLEICHER.] I am sure the importance of this question is not fully comprehended by those whose attention has not been particularly called to it And just here I will remark that there probably may be another misconception as to the feeling entertained by those who advocate and urge this special and marked action and recognition on the part of the House of this disturbed condition of our frontiers. The desire is to avoid complications, to avoid collision and war, to maintain peace. And in order to maintain that peace, it becomes a necessity that we should have better neighborhood than we have enjoyed for the last five years.

A district of country is rendered insecure larger in area than an average sized State of this Union. It is a district that is devoted mainly to stock raising, and the boundary there being of such a character as to be easily crossed at any time, a class of marauders pass in in small parties of two or three, who have their places of rendezvous. They come in, and, taking advantage of the sparseness of the population and the insufficiency of the military force there, carry off cattle and other stock by the hundred. This has continued until a large portion of the country there has become uninhabitable by the American population, and has to a degree been given up to the Mexicans, who have come in on the American side of the Rio Grande and settled there.

Mr. KASSON. How far have they penetrated into the country?

Mr. HANCOCK. They have penetrated the country for fifty or seventy-five miles, and in some instances for one hundred and twenty-five miles. They make their escape with almost perfect security. There have been but few instances where they have been intercepted by the military, as gentlemen will find by reference to the records of the military authorities.

It is alleged that the character of the cavalry is such that they are not adequate to the duty required to be performed; and it is likely that they cannot perform the duty in such a way as to guarantee the arrest of the marauders, even though they are frequently promptly notified of the incursions by the rancheros, as the stock-raisers are termed out there. But the marauders understand the country well, and are able to take advantage of their knowledge to evade the pursuit of the military. They do evade it; and as soon as they are on the other side of the river, then of course our forces are generally obliged to stop. Sometimes they have crossed over; and I do not object to that; yet I would rather such occurrences should not take place, and that some action should be taken that would render such a thing unnecessary.

I wish to remark further that I am not complaining so much as my remarks might seem to imply of the government of Mexico. I realize the comparative inability of that government to preserve peace and order upon her borders, and we are disposed to act with the greatest forbearance toward that government. But there are certainly means by which the offending parties could be reached without any encroachment on our part that could be justly complained of if the Mexican government would make adequate provision for our doing so.

This is a question that would properly come before such a committee as is now proposed, and upon its report the House will be better prepared to act understandingly. And perchance other Departments of the Government may be enabled to take such steps as will place this portion of the country in a better condition than it is at present, so that it may be habitable and enjoyable—the very reverse of its present condition.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, I have been a good deal impressed by the fair and candid presentation of the case of this border line by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HANCOCK] who has just taken his seat. But I want to call the attention of the House to a danger that always attends special committees and the supposed need of such a committee in this case.

This matter has been for years before Congress and before the Government; and owing to the depredations on the Mexican border a commission has been established, which, carefully selected, (both sides being represented,) has sat and heard the claims of citizens of both countries who have suffered losses by incursions from one side or the other. That commission has reported; so that the subject-matter of complaint presented by my friend from Texas is already before Congress. It is naturally then before the regular committees of Congress.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not see any difficulty in the Committee on Military Affairs and the Committee on Foreign Affairs dealing with this matter.

Mr. HANCOCK. Will the gentleman permit me to ask to what commission he referred when he spoke of both sides being represented?

Mr. HALE. The Mexican border commission.

The Committee on Foreign Affairs will naturally take charge of all the delicate relations arising in diplomacy between the two governments. There is no conflict between that committee and the Committee on Military Affairs, the latter being called upon to deal with the question of the force necessary to be maintained on that border for the protection of our citizens; and for one I should be glad to see that whole question go before the Military Committee—all the more because to-day we are confronted by many resolutions and bills providing for a decrease of the Army of the United States—a subject-matter which is before the Military Committee. One of the first questions to be considered by that committee in connection with this proposed reduction of the Army is the need of force and the proper extent of force upon the Mexican border. It is cognate to their work. They alone, in my view, can deal with that question broadly and largely, and I repeat that on this subject, so interesting to the people of Texas, there is no conflict between that committee and the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the latter committee dealing with the diplomacy of the question.

I wish that I could agree with the gentleman from Texas in believing that a special committee will tend to avert trouble rather than bring it on. Such is not my experience. A special committee, having but one subject-matter to deal with, naturally exaggerates the importance of that subject-matter. It draws all other things into it as tributary; it does not look at the question broadly and largely in connection with all matters relating to the subject, as a general committee does. For one I should fear that any special committee upon this subject, drawing to itself entire jurisdiction of it, would, instead of averting difficulty, complicate us in trouble with a neighboring state. For that reason, and for that alone, I hope that the special committee asked for may not be granted, but that the regular committees of the House may deal with this subject-matter as they do with other questions of equal importance.

I am reminded, Mr. Speaker, that on the reference of the different subject-matters contained in the annual message of the President of the United States this very subject has already been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I want to say only a few words in reply to the gentleman from Maine, who has just taken his seat. In what he has said he made some mention of claims that would be brought in under this special reference. Now, in this proceeding this subject of claims is one that we do not regard; we only want war avoided and peace preserved if possible. It is not the intention in the remotest degree to base any claims upon this reference to this committee.

I will repeat what I said before, that we have voluminous evidence on this subject and will be forced to run from one committee to another to plead our case before one of the regular committees and then plead it before another, perhaps leaving some documents needed by one committee in the possession of the other. It is impossible to draw exactly the line between the duties assigned under the rules to one of the regular committees and those assigned to another.

But we have not the least desire, as I have already stated, to bring about a war between this and a neighboring state. I believe that any committee which would be appointed by the Speaker of this House will not, as seemed to be intimated by the gentleman from Maine, wish to increase the present difficulties or stir up additional troubles on that frontier, but would, on the contrary, recognize the urgent necessity of doing away with the troubles and difficulties which unfortunately now exist. It is only for the purpose of preserving peace on that border that this resolution has been introduced.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I hope this matter will not be referred to one of the regular committees of this House. I believe it is a rule of parliamentary law that every measure ought to be committed to the custody of its friends. This question has been submitted to a regular committee of this House for years, and what has been the result? In the last session of Congress I presented the same question before the Committee on Military Affairs. I went and took upon myself the trouble to get the General of the Army of the United States to go before that committee and himself to testify that, by personal inspection of that territory, the frontier had been driven back two hundred miles. What did they do? He told them that he had seen the old rocks where the chimneys stood, and he had seen fields desolated by the enemy, both Mexicans and Indians. But the committee did nothing.

We have a frontier a thousand miles in extent which has been in a state of constant warfare, and what have the regular committees done? Have they been frightened by the questions of diplomacy, those delicate questions about which we have heard? They have done nothing for that frontier, which has been pleading for years, under all administrations of this Government, democratic and republican. They have not discharged their duties to our State. Th y have not protected our people. I myself have carried the testimony before the Military Committees of this House, and I suppose the same thing will occur before the present Military Committee.

In the distribution of the committees of this House, it has not been thought necessary to place a member from Texas on the Military Committee, while she has a thousand miles of border that is exposed to the raids of Mexicans and Indians. It has not been thought necessary to appoint a member from Texas upon the Committee on Indian Affairs, when, sir, the scalps of our people are being taken, and have been for years, by the Kiowas and Comanches; and I now ask this House in the spirit of justice to our people to appoint a committee which will grapple with this subject and bring the testimony before the House that they may act on it.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to ask the gentleman a question before he sits down.

Mr. MILLS. I will hear the gentleman with pleasure.

Mr. FRYE. I wish to inquire whether the proposition to reduce the Army is for the purpose of protecting this frontier?

Mr. MILLS. I will reply with great pleasure to the gentleman from Maine that that proposition will not get a vote in Texas.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, there is certainly no objection on the part of any gentleman on the floor of the House that these matters should be inquired into. Indeed, sir, Representatives upon this floor from every State of the Union cannot fail but feel the same degree of interest in this subject of inquiry as do the gentlemen from the State of Texas. It is a question affecting the interest of the whole country, and the gentlemen from Texas ought not to indulge in the assumption that an organized standing committee of this House will not fully perform its duties. All the duties that would devolve upon this committee manifestly would be such as might be appropriately referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I say nothing of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I say that the matters of inquiry are of that character that undoubtedly belong properly to the Committee on Military Affairs, and I do not think it is wise or safe that any legislation upon matters of great concern such as affect the relations of nations should go out of the ordinary beaten and well-established rules of legislative law. I think it is far safer and better for the State of Texas and for the whole Union that questions like this should go to the regular standing committees of the House.

Now, sir, no member can object to the Committee on Military Affairs being charged with every duty which this special committee would perform if it were organized. That committee will make these investigations, and will make its report to the House; and the gentleman cannot prejudge the action of that committee; he has no right to assume that the committee will fail to fully perform its duties as directed by the resolutions of this House. I have never seen any very satisfactory results springing out of special committees—and that for the reason suggested by the gentleman from Maine. We are naturally inclined to exaggerate the importance of a subject-matter which embraces the whole scope of a committee's action, whereas the general committee considers the subject in all its various bearings without reference to the motives which sometimes actuate us in connection with special committees. Whether it be from that or from other causes, the results of such special investigations have never been valuable as laying the foundations for legislative action.

It is manifest, and I desire to make that suggestion to the House, that many gentlemen from all sections of the country will think that upon particular subjects special committees should be organized. One has already been appointed, and others have been suggested. While the multiplication of special committees ought to be very carefully guarded against, if this committee were necessary, if the standing committee could not properly perform all the duties required, I should at once yield the point. But I insist that this subject properly belongs to one of the standing committees of the House, and that the gentleman from Texas may devolve upon the Military Committee the whole duty of making this investigation. If this is done, I feel very confident that that committee will comply with the reasonable expectations of the House in performing all the duties assigned to it.

Mr. REAGAN. I rise to a question of order. Is not the motion of the gentleman from Indiana out of order when my colleague has moved the previous question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. RANDALL.) The gentleman from Texas by unanimous consent was allowed to debate the resolution. The previous question was not demanded. Debate having been allowed, the Chair subsequently recognized the gentleman from Indiana who made the motion to refer. The object of the gentleman from Texas can be reached by voting down the demand for the previous question on the question of reference.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Though residing in a part of the Union far removed from Texas, I have been long satisfied that there was a condition of affairs upon the Mexican border such as needed immediate examination and immediate relief. It is said that this question has already been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and that the Committee on Military Affairs are properly in charge of it. Now, I understand that the duties of the Military Committee are exceedingly onerous, and I believe that this question is one that needs and should receive immediate investigation.

As I understand it, Mr. Speaker, the first duty of government is the protection of person and property, and when any government fails to discharge the duty of protecting person and property it ought to abdicate its functions. Indeed it has done so already. If, then, the action of this Government is not such as to furnish protection to the west border of Texas, it is time, ample time, that this subject should be investigated, and that we know exactly the condition of affairs in that portion of our country. If it turns out that the condition of affairs is such as the Representatives from that State have described upon this floor, we ought to know it at an early day of this session, to the end that the emergency may be provided for. It is a matter that ample time should be taken to provide for.

I do not stand here to pronounce a eulogium on the British government; but there is one thing in the action of the British government which I am compelled to admire, and that is the promptness with which every portion of the empire feels an insult or injury to one of its citizens, and the readiness with which it avenges it. In talking of avenging, I do not apply that expression to the Republic of Mexico. I believe the Republic of Mexico is very little to blame in intention as to the state of affairs existing upon the Texan border. But I believe that the existence of these disorders on her extreme frontier is due to the weakness of the Government power in those regions. If a condition of affairs exists there such as is represented, we cannot understand it a day too quick; and for that reason I, for one, am in favor of granting to the people of Texas an early examination of this matter, to the end that the evil may be promptly corrected.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to hear the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] on this subject. I am a little surprised to find objection on this side of the House to the appointment of the special committee desired by the delegation from Texas. I can see no objection whatever to it. It costs nothing, and it will give us all the information necessary to form correct views with regard to the outrages which have been perpetrated in Texas much more readily than we can obtain it from any other source. The general subject has been referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and the Committee on Military Affairs, and it may be months before either of those committees can report on this subject. This is no matter of small importance. It is one of the greatest importance, as I understand it, to the people of Texas; and the request of the delegates from that State unanimously, as I understand, is that a special committee shall be appointed, so that the House may understand at once the difficulties existing on the border. The gentleman from Maine speaks of the jurisdiction of the committee, and that it may involve serious questions and commit the House and the Government to matters to which, in their view, they would object; but the committee will have no jurisdiction whatever except to send for persons and papers and to give us accurate information in regard to the difficulties on that border. Sir, it seems to me that there can be no objection to the appointment of this special committee, and I hope that the House will grant the request of the delegation from Texas and appoint a special committee for the purposes indicated.

The question was taken upon Mr. HOLMAN'S motion, and it was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon Mr. SCHLEICHER'S resolution; and, being put, the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. SCHLEICHER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER. I ask unanimous consent that that resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The joint resolution is as follows:

Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States so as to elect the President and Vice-President thereof by a direct vote of the people thereof.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of each House concurring therein,) That the following article is hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States, shall be valid as a part of the Constitution, to wit:

ARTICLE —.

After the year 1876 the President and Vice-President of the United States shall be elected by a direct vote of the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the same qualification as the electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

The person receiving the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President and the person receiving the greatest number of votes for Vice-President shall be the Vice-President; but if two or more persons shall each receive an equal and the greatest number of votes for President, then the House of Representatives shall from such persons immediately choose the President; and if two or more persons shall each receive an equal and the greatest number of votes for Vice-President, then the Senate shall from such persons immediately choose the Vice-President. In such elections each House shall vote viva voce, and each member shall have one vote, and the person receiving a majority of the votes cast shall be elected; and in case of a tie the presiding officer shall determine it.

The election for President and Vice-President shall be held at the time now provided by law for choosing the electors of such officers, but Congress may prescribe a different time, which shall be the same in all the States; and Congress shall prescribe the manner of holding and conducting such elections and making the returns thereof; and in case of failure so to do, that duty shall devolve in the order named, first, on the President of the United States; second, on the Legislature of each State within that State; and, third, upon the chief executive of each State within that State.

The returns shall be canvassed at the time and in the manner now provided or which may be hereafter provided by the joint rules of the two Houses or by law, by and in the presence of both Houses of Congress, who shall be the judges (each House voting separately) of the returns and election; but in case the two Houses shall not agree, then the matter of disagreement shall be referred to the Supreme Court of the United States, which shall forthwith decide the same; and such decision shall be final.

Whereas, by chapter 148, laws of 1864, it was enacted that the proportion of the annuities to which certain stray bands of Winnebago and Pottawatomie Indians, who were then residing in the State of Wisconsin, would be entitled if they were settled upon their reservations with their respective tribes shall be retained in the Treasury to their credit from year to year, to be paid to them when they shall unite with their said tribes, or be used by the Secretary in defraying the expenses of their removal or in settling and subsisting them on any reservation which may hereafter be provided for them; and whereas, since the passage of said act, the sum of $35,000 has been appropriated to enable the Secretary of the Interior to take charge of said stray bands of Winnebago and Pottawatomie Indians in the State of Wisconsin; and whereas the sum of $76,000 has been appropriated and the sum of $36,000 has been re-appropriated for the removal of the said stray bands of Indians out of the State of Wisconsin; and whereas the Secretary of the Interior has decided that under the laws of the United States, these stray bands of Indians are entitled to their just proportion of the tribal fund, and that the same should be paid to them; and whereas Congress, on the 3d day of March, 1875, passed what is known as the enabling act, which provides that any Indian may abandon his tribal relation, take up a homestead, and yet be entitled to a share in the tribal fund; and whereas, under and in virtue of the provisions of said act, a large number of the said stray bands of Winnebago and Pottawatomie Indians have renounced their tribal relations, made and filed in the proper courts declarations of intention to become citizens of the United States, and taken up and settled upon homesteads on the public lands in the counties of Jackson, Marathon, and Portage, in the State of Wisconsin, and are greatly in need of any fund remaining in the Treasury to which they are or may be entitled: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior report to this House without unnecessary delay, first, what amount of annuities or tribal funds said stray bands of Winnebago Indians would have been entitled to if they had been living with their tribes, and what sum or sums of said annuities or tribal fund have been retained in the Treasury from year to year and placed to their credit; second, if any part thereof has been expended, under what authority and for what purpose, and the amount thereof, giving the same in detail; the amount expended in taking care of said stray bands of Indians in Wisconsin since the passage of the said act and prior to the year 1871; how expended and to whom paid, giving details thereof.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the preamble and resolution were adopted.

The SPEAKER. Are they lengthy?

Mr. GOODIN. They are not lengthy.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands. They are as follows:

Copy of resolutions unanimously recommended by action of the Kansas State Horticultural Society at its ninth annual meeting, held at Manhattan, Riley County, December 14-16, 1875.

Whereas it is the opinion of those who have paid the most attention to the habits of the Rocky Mountain locust, or so-called grasshopper, that the vast swarms which occasionally devastate the fertile fields of Kansas, Iowa, Nebraska, Minnesota, and Missouri have their origin and breeding-place in the Rocky Mountain region of the northwest portion of the country; and whereas the injuries of this insect are at times so great as to prove a national calamity; and whereas there is hope that a thorough study of the pest in its native breeding-places may show how to prevent its irruptions into the fertile country to the southeast, either by some more extended system of irrigation, to destroy the eggs, or by other means; and whereas the ravages of this insect are the principal hinderance to the settlement of a vast portion of the public domain lying immediately east of the Rocky Mountains: Therefore,

Resolved, That we, the fruit-growers of Kansas, earnestly urge upon the national Congress the advisability and desirability of causing the proper investigations to be made.

Resolved, That the importance of the subject not only warrants but requires the appointment of a competent commission to make these investigations; and further,

Resolved, That the secretary is hereby instructed to forward an authentic copy of the foregoing resolutions to each of our Representatives and Senators in Congress and to the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of the original on file in the secretary's office of the Kansas State Horticultural Society, this 29th December, 1875.

G. C. BRACKETT,
Secretary.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next, and I desire to state in this connection that I make the motion at the instance of the Committee on Appropriations. The Committee on Appropriations desire two full days of this week for the purpose of maturing one or two bills to report next week, and I do not doubt that various other committees of the House are in like condition. I suppose the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means will corroborate my statement as to his own committee.

Mr. MORRISON. What the gentleman from Pennsylvania has said in regard to the Committee on Appropriations is true, though probably not to the same extent, of all the other committees of the House. We have seen the evidence of it when the committees were called and none were ready to report. I therefore trust that the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will prevail.

I desire, however, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow me, to say that there are a number of gentlemen who have speeches to deliver on subjects embraced in the President's message, and I therefore ask unanimous consent that Saturday next be set aside for that purpose, no business to be done on that day.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I do not like to antagonize these two gentlemen, but during my experience I have never yet been a member of this House when, after it has been in session a full month it has not been ready to consider the business which devolved upon it. Now, I do think that we have had vacation and delay enough. We will certainly be obliged during this long session to take a vacation to prepare this Hall for occupation during that portion of the summer we may be here. It is probable that we will be compelled to take many other recesses during this session. We should now proceed to the performance of our duties, or we will be compelled to sit here until mid-summer. I for one hope we will proceed to perform the duties devolving upon us. If any committee, that on appropriations for instance, wants time to mature its business, let it have the privilege of sitting during the sessions of the House, so that the House itself may be able to proceed and consider the subjects of legislation already before us.

Mr. RANDALL. My answer to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] is this: The experience of every old member here is that nothing is lost by allowing adequate time to the committees to prepare legislation. While I was authorized by the Committee on Appropriations to make this motion, we felt at the same time that other committees of the House were in a like situation with ourselves. I maintain that all our experience shows that adjournments at the beginning of a session have uniformly been taken for this purpose from Thursday until the following Monday.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. My experience teaches me that, after a holiday vacation of two weeks, the committees having been appointed before the vacation, they have generally been prepared to report. I will go further than that and say that I know of no instance when the Committee on Appropriations have been ready to report before six or eight weeks after the beginning of the session. And while I fully appreciate the efforts of the chairman of that committee——

The SPEAKER. The rule imperatively requires the Committee on Appropriations to report the general appropriation bills within thirty days after their appointment.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I am aware that there is a rule to that effect, but I am also aware that heretofore that rule has not been maintained by the action of that committee, except in the case of a few unimportant appropriation bills. I do not desire to antagonize these gentlemen; I only wish to say that we must sooner or later proceed to the business before us; and I am ready to sit here every day in the week for the purpose of performing our duty.

Mr. HALE. Allow me to correct the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] for I know he has no desire to do injustice.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Certainly not.

Mr. HALE. I will say that former Committees on Appropriations of this House have been ready to report and have reported important appropriation bills, the naval appropriation bill for instance, before the holiday adjournment. That has slipped the memory of the gentleman undoubtedly, but such is the case; and now that I correct him, I think his memory will bear me out in that statement.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Before the holiday vacation?

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. That had escaped me; I had no idea before that it had been done. That is only an additional reason why we should proceed at once to consider the measures before us, and to receive reports from committees.

Mr. RANDALL. One word more. The committees were not appointed until the morning of the day of the adjournment for the holidays. The Committee on Appropriations did at once proceed, on the next day, to distribute among its members the various bills, with a view to bringing the appropriation bills before the House at the earliest practicable moment. But we have to examine these appropriation bills with a great deal of care and scrutiny, with a view to reducing, if possible, without doing any injustice, the appropriations for carrying on the Government. I hope, then, that this proposition will be deemed so manifestly right that it will not be objected to.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] accept as a part of his motion the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MORRISON,] that a session of the House be had on Saturday for debate only?

Mr. RANDALL. I myself have no objection to that proposition. But it will require unanimous consent, and of course if there be any objection to it I cannot accept it without destroying my original motion.

The SPEAKER. Then the question is, will the House when it adjourns to-day adjourn to meet on Monday next?

Mr. HEREFORD. I desire to say but a word or two. This is the first time I have spoken upon this question of adjournment. I agree with my friend from New York [Mr. WOOD] that we should go to work, and since I have been here my experience has been that when the House takes a recess the committees likewise take a recess. I think that will be the result in this case. I think that when the House is in working order and doing its daily work the committees then do more work than they do when the House has taken a recess. If we take a recess until Monday, two-thirds of the members of this House will absent themselves and go home. That is the result of my experience here, and therefore I hope the motion will not prevail.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. RANDALL that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next; and upon a division there were—ayes 111, noes 72.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRISON. I now renew my request that unanimous consent be given for a session of the House on Saturday next for debate only. It is hardly necessary for me to say that I have no speech to make; but I make this request in behalf of other gentlemen who have speeches to make. For myself, I am indifferent whether the request be granted or not.

AMNESTY.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. RANDALL,] when it is his intention to bring the House to a vote on the amnesty bill?

Mr. RANDALL. On Monday next.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire, then, to have printed an amendment in the nature of a substitute which I propose to offer to his bill.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I rise to a question of order. Has the call of States and Territories been finished?

The SPEAKER. It has not; but this matter has been going on by consent, and the Chair cannot stop it now. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] sends to the desk a proposition which he gives notice he will present on Monday next as an amendment to the bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] on the subject of amnesty.

Mr. RANDALL. I am willing it shall be read; but I do not now say that I will allow a vote upon it.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman has no assignment for his bill as yet.

Mr. RANDALL. There is a special assignment.

Mr. BLAINE. I think the gentleman is in error; but the fact of course will be determined by th. Journal.

Mr. RANDALL. The Journal, I think, will show that I am right.

The Clerk read the proposed amendment of Mr. BLAINE as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all persons now under the disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, with the exception of Jefferson Davis, late president of the so-called Confederate States, shall be relieved of such disabilities upon their appearing before any judge of a United States court and taking and subscribing in open court the following oath, to be duly attested and recorded, namely: I, A. B., do solemnly swear, or affirm, that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that, to the best of my knowledge and ability, I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of a citizen of the United States.

Mr. BLAINE. I ask that my proposed amendment be printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed, upon a reference to the Journal, that the point made by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] is correct.

Mr. RANDALL. Does not the Journal show——

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the entry in the Journal.

The Clerk read as follows:

By Mr. RANDALL: A bill to remove the disabilities imposed by the third section of the fourteenth article of the amendments of the Constitution of the United States; which was read a first and second time, and made a special order for Tuesday next, after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. RANDALL. The order does not contain the words "and from day to day until disposed of?"

The SPEAKER. Those words are not embraced in the order.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I give notice that I shall move to suspend the rules——

Mr. BLAINE. With a view of cutting off debate? The gentleman cannot do that on the plea that there will be objection to bringing up the bill for consideration. No one on this side will object.

Mr. RANDALL. I will move to suspend the rules to make it a special order.

Mr. BLAINE. There is no necessity for doing that.

Mr. RANDALL. I am willing to allow debate.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to get an understanding about this matter. Does the gentleman propose to suspend the rules so as not only to make the bill a special order, but to cut off the privilege of amendment? Because, if he proposes to allow that privilege, there is no necessity for suspending the rules. Unanimous consent will undoubtedly be given that the gentleman may choose his day and make his assignment. But if the gentleman's intention is to suspend the rules with the view of cutting off debate, then possibly he may find some difficulty in getting the assignment made. If, however, he merely desires to have the bill assigned for consideration, with liberty to offer amendments, I have no doubt he will receive unanimous consent.

Mr. RANDALL. When the bill comes up, I could at once demand the previous question and cut off amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. If the gentleman's design be to preclude any opportunity for amendment, he may meet with some difficulty, unless I mistake the temper of the House. By unanimous consent he may have the bill made a special order, provided liberty of discussion and amendment be permitted; but if he undertakes to cut that off he will require a suspension of the rules, for which, of course, a two-thirds vote will be necessary. If the gentleman chooses to raise that issue, then I think he will block his bill at the very threshold.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, sir, the responsibility for that will not be with me, but with you.

Mr. BLAINE. Of course; and that is a responsibility which we are quite willing to assume.

Mr. RANDALL. If that side of the House does not want to grant amnesty, I cannot help it.

Mr. BLAINE. Then I understand, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman will ask a suspension of the rules with the intention that there shall be neither debate nor amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman has no right to undertake to state my intentions further than I may choose to disclose them.

Mr. BLAINE. Of course the gentleman can get unanimous consent to have the bill made a special order, with opportunity for discussion and amendment; and, therefore, if that is the purpose, there is no necessity for a suspension of the rules.

Mr. COX. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. RANDALL. I am quite willing to have the discussion go on, and to meet the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, that by unanimous consent a session be held on Saturday next, as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for debate only, no business whatever to be transacted.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I object.

Subsequently Mr. BAKER withdrew his objection to a session on Saturday for debate only.

The SPEAKER. The Chair again asks whether there is objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois for a session on Saturday for debate only, no business whatever to be transacted?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of New York. I object.

Mr. BLAINE. I understand the amendment I propose to offer has been ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. Such order has not been entered.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not think there can be any objection to allowing the amendment to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and it will be ordered accordingly.

RECEIVERS OF NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. COX. I wish to introduce a bill (H. R. No. 655) authorizing the appointment of receivers of national banks, and for other purposes, and to state that it has been drawn by the Comptroller of the Currency, who is alone responsible for its provisions.

The bill was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

PURCHASE OF GOLD DUST AT DENVER BRANCH MINT.

PURCHASE OF THE BLACK HILLS.

Mr. KIDDER submitted the following resolution; on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be, and is hereby, requested to inquire into the expediency of opening the Black Hills, so called, or so much thereof as may be deemed necessary, for the purpose of general settlement, by purchase of the Indians who may have title thereto or otherwise, securing proper rights of way to the same through the Indian country which it may be necessary to pass over to reach them, and report at their earliest convenience by bill or otherwise.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from Tennessee will allow the call of Territories to be concluded. The call has been completed so far with the exception of a few Territories, the Delegates from which desire to present bills for reference.

Mr. BRIGHT. I withdraw the motion to adjourn, for the purpose of allowing the call to be completed.

AMENDMENT TO COINAGE ACT OF 1873.

PETITION OF WORKINGMEN OF THE DISTRICT.

Mr. BRIGHT. The call of States and Territories having been finished, I renew my motion that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I ask the gentleman to yield to me a moment for a question of privilege.

Mr. BRIGHT. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I ask by unanimous consent an order of the House to strike out from the permanent form of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD some five or ten pages of extraneous matter attached to the petition which I asked permission of the House yesterday to have printed, those pages of extraneous matter having been printed by mistake along with the petition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks that all of the memorial yesterday presented by him and which was ordered to be printed in the RECORD be stricken out of the RECORD, except the memorial itself. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BRIGHT. I yield for a moment to my colleague to introduce a bill.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE CUMBERLAND RIVER.

Mr. HOUSE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 663) to continue the improvement of the Cumberland River; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I demand the regular order.

Mr. BRIGHT. I decline to yield further.

Before the question is taken on the motion to adjourn, the Chair desires to lay before the House a very voluminous amount of matter, testimony, records, and other things pertaining to contested-election cases now pending before the House, a list of which the Clerk will read. Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented the petition of J. R. Lyford and sundry other citizens of Prescott, Wisconsin, praying for the appointment of a commission to take testimony as to the results of the use of intoxicating liquors; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DORSEY presented the petition of Julia Scroggin, of Lewisburgh, Conway County, Arkansas, widow of Humphrey Scroggin, late soldier in the Georgia Volunteers, war of 1812, praying that she may be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Arkansas, in favor of an appropriation for the improvement of the navigation of the White River; which was referred to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented the memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Arkansas, praying that an act be passed for the relief of the widow and heirs of the late Peter T. Crutchfield, setting forth that in 1861 Peter T. Crutchfield, then United States depositary, had certain moneys seized belonging to him, and asking that the United States district attorney at Little Rock, Arkansas, be directed to examine into the facts and make an equitable settlement under the direction of the Solicitor of the Treasury; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Arkansas, asking the construction of national levees to reclaim the alluvial lands of the Mississippi River; which was referred to the Select Committee on the Levees of the Mississippi River, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WINDOM. I present the memorial of the State Grange of Minnesota in convention assembled the 16th day of December, 1875, at the city of Minneapolis, stating that the farming interests of Minnesota have added to the wealth and prosperity of the country by 30,000,000 bushels of wheat, 16,000,000 bushels of oats, 8,000,000 bushels of corn, 2,000,000 bushels of barley, and 1,000,000 tons of hay within the last year, and asking, in view of the burdensome charges by rail, and of the evils resulting therefrom, and of the cheapness of shipment by water, that Congress make an appropriation, at this session sufficient to complete the work now in progress on the Fox River, and also to construct an ample canal along the banks of the Wisconsin River from Portage City to Prairie du Chien, Wisconsin, in accordance with the recommendation of General Warren.

I beg to call the especial attention of the committee to this memorial, which expresses the wishes of the farmers not only of my own State, but also of the entire Northwest. State Legislatures and commercial conventions have for many years memorialized Congress for the completion of this great work of internal improvement. At the last session I had the honor to present the petition of 50,000 farmers of Iowa, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Nebraska, and other Western States, urging its speedy completion. Almost every mail this session has brought hundreds of names of petitioners praying for the same thing. I know of no public work which will, for so small an amount of money, so largely relieve the people from the burdens of transportation, and add so much to the development and wealth of the country.

I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Gibbons, asking to be indemnified for losses incurred by him because of the violation of a contract made on the 15th of November, 1863, between him and the United States for the delivery of 200,000 bushels of oats; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the memorial of D. F. Chandler, late major and brevet lieutenant-colonel United States Army, praying the removal of his political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ALLISON (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. ELECTION OF PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, (having called for resolutions.) The Chair understands there is nothing pending within the morning hour and no special order. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] yesterday made a report from the Committee on Privileges and Elections in regard to a matter involving an officer of the Senate, or his right to be an officer of the Senate. It seems to me the Senate ought to take some action upon the proposition submitted by that committee; and, if it is now in order, I will move that the resolution offered during the last month by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] be now taken up with a view to offer a substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the resolution which he has named be taken from the table for consideration.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have not had time to examine the report.

Mr. SHERMAN. Until the Senator from Vermont can read the report more fully, I will offer, as a substitute for his pending resolution, the proposition reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think that this had better go over probably until to-morrow, as the report has just been laid upon our table. I dare say I shall agree to everything that the committee have reported, but I have not had an opportunity to read the report; and if it is agreeable to the Senator and the Senate, I should prefer to have it go over until Monday or to-morrow, if we sit to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that, but we seemed to have no business to-day, and I presumed this matter could be disposed of, as it certainly ought to be.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We have some executive business. I have not had time to look over this report.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to a postponement.

Mr. THURMAN. I hope this will go over until Monday, so as to give us an opportunity to examine the report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Chair hears no objection, and the matter will lie over.

MILITARY ARRESTS IN ALASKA.

Mr. MITCHELL. On the 16th of last month I introduced a resolution calling for information simply, which was laid over for the time being. I move to take it up now.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested to furnish the Senate, if not incompatible with the public service, with a statement of the number of military arrests made in the Territory of Alaska during the past five years, together with the date of each, the charge on which made in each case, the names of the persons arrested, and the period and character of the imprisonment of each in that Territory before trial or surrender to the civil authorities for trial.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state that this resolution substantially was introduced at the last session, referred to the Military Committee, and reported back favorably. I hope there will be no delay now. I see no necessity for another reference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

FINANCIAL CONDITION OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to give notice that on Wednesday morning next I will ask the indulgence of the Senate to permit me to make some remarks on the questions of the expenses of the Government, the revenue, and the public debt.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, unless some Senator has some business to propose, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to.

COURTS IN THE INDIAN COUNTRY.

Mr. CLAYTON. Although the galleries have been cleared, I ask unanimous consent to consider the doors open for the purpose of presenting a question of reference. I desire to move a reconsideration of the vote by which the resolution introduced by me yesterday with regard to the propriety of establishing minor courts in the Indian country was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; and if that motion prevails, I shall move to refer it to the Committee on Indian Affairs. I have consulted with the members of the Judiciary Committee, and they make no objection. I therefore move now to reconsider the vote by which that resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let me suggest to the Senator that it is much easier to merely discharge the Committee on the Judiciary and refer the papers to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. ALLISON. I think that subject is now in the hands of the proper committee—the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not want to raise any discussion at this time; but the Committee on Indian Affairs have two bills before them now, which they are considering, providing for the establishment of courts in the Indian country, and I do not think it wise to divide this labor between two committees. Either those bills which the Committee on Indian Affairs now have ought to go to the Committee on the Judiciary or this matter should go to the latter committee. I think the chairman of the Judiciary Committee will readily see that it is not well to have this business divided up between two committees.

Mr. ALLISON. I quite agree to that; but it occurs to me that, if this is a matter relating to the establishment of courts, it properly belongs to the Judiciary Committee. I have no preference about it, however.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Of course, on the face of it this is purely a judicial question, or substantially so; but as the Senator from Arkansas who introduced the resolution desires it to go to the Committee on Indian Affairs, I have consulted the members of the Judiciary Committee mostly, and they have not the slightest personal objection to its taking any course which the Senator prefers, and therefore, so far as we are concerned, we assent to being discharged from the consideration of the subject and to its going to the Indian Committee or anywhere else.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This debate proceeds by general consent, the doors being closed.

Mr. CLAYTON. I understand that the Committee on the Judiciary consents to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject. That being the case, I move that that committee be discharged from the consideration of the resolution offered by me yesterday and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. INGALLS, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to day it be to meet on Monday next.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after twenty minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at twelve o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, January 10, 1876.

Mr. JAMES L. ALCORN, a Senator from the State of Mississippi, appeared in his seat to-day.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the War Department, transmitting, in compliance with law, a statement of the expenditures and operations of the Springfield armory, and the arms, components of arms, and appendages fabricated, altered, and repaired there during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SARGENT. I present the petition of the State Vinicultural Society of California, signed by J. R. Snyder, as president, setting forth some very valuable facts in reference to the culture of the vine and the manufacture of brandy, and asking for certain relief.

I beg the permission of the Senate to call the attention of the Committee on Finance and of the Senate, very briefly, to one or two considerations in connection with this petition. In France the amount of wine produced annually is 1,500,000,000 gallons, which is valued at $300,000,000. It employs annually 5,000,000 happy, prosperous people, and it is stated that two vintages of the grape in France paid off the enormous demand which was made by Germany upon France upon the conclusion of the late war, which was $1,000,000,000. Now, California presents about the same area of land in its boundaries as France. One-half of it is mountain land, well adapted to the culture of the grape, and only fit for that. There are at the present time 30,000,000 vines in California. There is very little general sale of California wines, for the reason that those same wines sent to New York, or even making a voyage to Europe and there "cut" with an inferior German or French wine with a foreign label put upon them, have a charge of 400 per cent. over the cost in California at which they may be furnished, and the foreign article has the preference in trade over California wine, and the prejudice in favor of foreign wines excludes the more wholesome article which is produced in California. The result is that we feed our grapes to hogs in enormous quantities, and that large areas of land lie waste which might be cultivated usefully by this industry.

The only method by which a remedy can be applied, at present, is by a relaxation of the rules with reference to the taxation of brandy. Brandy is not palatable under six years of age, and is not generally marketable under twelve years, for it does not reach its full value until that time. The Government tax levied upon it, with the interest which is paid in California, amounts to $1.80 per gallon, which is prohibitory of the production of a good article. What these memorialists particularly desire, and what is needed for the interest of this product, is, that there be a species of Government warehouse provided, or some other regulation of that kind, in which the brandy can be stored and the tax be paid to the Government at the time it goes to the market, and, if necessary, security be taken from the vineyards and the other property of the persons who manufacture the brandy. The Government pays bounties to fishermen; it makes discrimination in favor of ship-building in its tariff, and encourages domestic productions in a variety of ways. I have no objection to that policy. I only say it is fair that it should be extended to California—a State which is struggling to build up an industry that is capable of reaching the vast sum of $300,000,000 annually. I trust that this proposition will be well considered by the Finance Committee and by the Senate. I am very well aware that no bill can be originated in the Senate relating to this matter, but it is probable that some revenue bill will reach us from the House of Representatives, and at that time I shall ask to be still further heard upon the matter.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I also ask leave to present a memorial of officers and seamen on vessels which were captured by rebel cruisers and their property destroyed, they being, during the time which was allowed to file their claims before the Alabama commission, absent in the pursuit of their avocation. They pray that the time may be extended during which such claims can be filed. The court of Alabama claims, I believe, remarked of this that it was a most meritorious class of cases, which it unquestionably is. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I present a petition, by request, of 22,626 women of Utah, which, on account of the magnitude of the petition and the sex from which it comes, I ask may be read at the Clerk's desk. It is not very lengthy. In presenting this petition, I beg leave to say that I do not concur in the objects of the petitioners; I do not desire to commit myself to vote for any measure carrying out their wishes; but I do believe in the right of petition, and therefore I have cheerfully complied with the request which they have made to me that this petition should reach the Senate. I ask that it may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be reported if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

MEMORIAL OF THE WOMEN OF UTAH TO THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

We, your memorialists, women of Utah, prompted by a due sense of justice, and in consideration of those equal rights so long the proud boast of American citizens, hereby appeal to your honorable body, praying you to grant our petition as shall be herein specified.

We, as a people, are willing to submit to and do strictly obey the Constitution and laws of the United States, as handed down to us by the fathers of our country; and we do earnestly pray that you will repeal the anti-polygamy law of 1862, also the bill known as the Poland bill, both being special and unconstitutional measures directed against the people of Utah, holding the peace and happiness of our lives in constant jeopardy, by imperiling the safety of our husbands and fathers, by daily and hourly subjecting them to danger of arrest and imprisonment, which would deprive us not only of their society, but also of their support and protection. To you, the executives of a great and powerful nation, we appeal for protection against these cruel and oppressive measures, which have shorn our glorious Constitution of its efficacy, and us of every protection but the overruling power of God.

We ask to be relieved from the unjust and law-breaking officials forced upon us by the Government, that we may have the jurisdiction of our own courts and the selection of our own officers, as we had in the past, when our cities were free from dram-shops, gambling-dens, and houses of infamy. As mothers and sisters we earnestly appeal to you for help, that our sons and brothers may be saved from drunkenness and vice, and our daughters from the power of the seducer. Also that all laws shall be repealed that will restrict us in our religious faith, inasmuch as the Constitution emphatically says, "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof;" also, "No religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States."

And, in accordance with our sacred Constitution, which was bequeathed as a protective boon by our forefathers, guaranteeing the right of conscience, we, your memorialists, do humbly pray that no bill or act shall have the sanction of your honorable body that shall in any way conflict or interfere with the belief in and practice of plural marriage as it is practiced by many of the citizens of Utah, and which most of your petitioners have adopted as a portion of their religious faith, in all sincerity believing it to be necessary not only in remedying evils and producing good in our present existence, but that without it man cannot hereafter attain to a fullness of exaltation.

We also ask that each married woman in Utah be granted the right to homestead or pre-exempt one hundred and sixty acres of land in her own name; also, that the citizens of Utah have the right to use for their own benefit the timber growing on Government land in Utah, which has been forbidden by the Government officials, to our great detriment, thereby depriving us of necessary material for building habitations and otherwise improving our homes.

And furthermore, we do most earnestly pray that Utah be admitted as a State, with all the rights and privileges guaranteed to every State in this great Republic.

That God in his mercy will so direct the legislation of your honorable body that we may promptly receive the aid we solicit at your hands, your memorialists will ever pray.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Territories.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL presented the petition of the Methodist Episcopal church of Lynn, Massachusetts, signed by the pastor and officers, asking for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. THURMAN. I have been requested to present several petitions from citizens of Mahoning County, in the State of Ohio, praying Congress to repeal the resumption act, and also to enact a law providing (as soon as practicable) for the retirement of the national-bank notes, substituting therefor the legal-tender notes of the United States; also, for an enactment that the Treasurer of the United States be directed to prepare a bond, bearing interest at the rate of 3.65 per cent., payable semi-annually, convertible at the option of the holder into legal-tender notes of the United States, principal and interest payable in currency, and running such length of time as in your judgment may seem best, the proceeds from the sale of said bonds to be applied, first, to the redemption of our 6 per cent., and, second, to the redemption of our 5 per cent. gold-bearing bonds.

In accordance with the request of the signers, I present these petitions, and I move their reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented the petition of John T. Pickett and Joseph J. Stewart, on behalf of the French spoliation claimants, praying the return from France of evidence of the losses sustained by American citizens through the illegal capturing of their vessels and cargoes by the French between 1792 and July 31, 1801, which evidence was sent to France by the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented the memorial of the San Francisco Land Association, of Philadelphia, praying that certain records of grants of land in the mission of Dolores, in and near the city of San Francisco, California, may be admitted, and that a bill may be passed for their relief granting to them indemnity for the lands contained in the Santillan grant, and which were wrested from them by a decree of the Supreme Court of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented the petition of G. Van Steenwyk and numerous other citizens of La Crosse, Wisconsin, praying for the repeal of the act imposing a two-cent stamp tax on bank-checks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DORSEY presented the memorial of the Legislature of Arkansas, in favor of the appointment of a competent corps of engineers to make a topographical survey of the Upper Arkansas River; which was referred to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard.

He also presented the memorial of the Legislature of Arkansas, in favor of an act donating unsold public land in that State for educational purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONKLING. I present the memorial of Leicester A. Sawyer, a citizen of the State of New York, a man of learning, asking a change and reformation of the Gregorian year as now observed, and giving his reasons for it. I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING presented the petition of the Greenwood Baptist church of Brooklyn, New York, signed by the appropriate officers, asking for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Daniel G. Fort, in behalf of the widow of the late David Richie, praying that she may be allowed a pension on account of services rendered by her husband during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, in favor of admitting gilling-twine for fishing free of duty; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, in favor of an appropriation for the survey of the Michigan ship-canal from the mouth of the Kalamazoo River, on the eastern shore of Lake Michigan, to the mouth of the River Raisin, on Lake Erie; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of James R. Odell and 86 others, citizens of Newaygo County, Michigan, the petition of H. J. Leonard and 120 others, citizens of Belding, Ionia County, Michigan, and the petition of H. B. Bennett and 40 others, citizens of Michigan, asking Congress to give a bounty of $200 in money to each Union soldier and sailor in lieu of homestead donation without actual settlement; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. INGALLS presented an additional petition of Ann Atkinson, widow of the late Hopeful Toler, a soldier of the war of 1812, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CLAYTON. I move that the memorial of the Choctaw Nation of Indians, asking for the settlement of its claims, presented by myself on last Thursday, be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 282) to declare the road leading from Concordia, Kentucky, to Mooleyville, Kentucky, a post-road; and

A bill (H. R. No. 283) to change the name of the steamboat Tom Jasper, of Saint Louis, Missouri.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of George S. Hawkins, of Jackson County, Florida, praying for the removal of his political disabilities, incurred by reason of his participation in the rebellion, reported a bill (S. No. 204) to remove the political disabilities of George S. Hawkins, of Florida; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. HAMILTON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 44) granting a pension to Jacob Nix, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

JOINT RULES OF THE TWO HOUSES.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am directed by the Committee on Rules to report back the resolution introduced by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to adopt the joint rules of the two Houses in force at the last session of Congress, with an amendment. It may be as well perhaps to consider it at this time, if there be no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears none, and the resolution, with the amendment, will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The resolution as originally introduced was as follows:

Resolved, That the joint rules of the Senate and House of Representatives in force at the close of the last session of Congress be, and the same are hereby, adopted as the joint rules of the two Houses for the present session.

The committee propose to amend the resolution by inserting after the word "Resolved" the words:

By the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring.)

Mr. MORTON. If it is in order, I move to amend by striking out the twenty-second joint rule.

Mr. HAMLIN. That will be in order after the Senate shall have acted on the amendment proposed by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the committee has precedence. The question is on the amendment of the committee making this a concurrent resolution instead of a Senate resolution.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, from what is said to me by Senators around me, I apprehend that the scope of the resolution and the subject to which it relates may not be familiar to all the Senate. I will state very briefly what the resolution is. It is a novel proposition. It is such a one as I have never before known in the Senate. I have made some investigation in relation to the matter, and I do not find that from the commencement of the Government to the present time the attention of the Senate has ever been called to the precise point which the resolution raises and brings before us.

The Senate has its rules. The Senate is an existing body, and its rules exist with the body. The House of Representatives is a body which expires once in two years, and its rules expire, of course, with each expiring Congress. We have besides what we call the joint rules for the arrangement of business between the two Houses—rules that have been concurrently agreed upon by both the House and the Senate; and I think that from the commencement of the Government to the present time—certainly within my recollection—there has been no instance when the Senate or the House has been asked to act at the commencement of any session of Congress upon the joint rules. Occasionally new joint rules are proposed and agreed to; amendments are suggested and agreed to. But what is the condition of things? The House, in its constitutional limit, expires, and with it its joint rules must expire; and if they expire upon the part of the House, they must necessarily expire upon the part of the Senate; and it is only by acquiescence in long years that they have been treated and regarded as rules, and not by an affirmative vote either of the House or of the Senate.

But the Senator from Vermont now brings the matter to the notice of the Senate, and on looking at it carefully, and critically, and in a legal point of view, the committee are unanimously of opinion that the point which he has suggested is one which the Senate certainly should take notice of, at least when it is brought to its attention. To illustrate its necessity, some action of the body is desired under a joint rule to-day, and the Senator rises in his place and interposes an objection that there is no joint rule existing to-day between the House and the Senate to which either the Senate or the present House has agreed, and it would seem to me that in a parliamentary sense that objection would be well taken. True, we may acquiesce in the adoption of such rules as the House may adopt; they may adopt these several rules; but I suggest that in their action this year they have not done so, and I think in the ruling of the Speaker of the House in a very few words he has placed the matter so clear and so plain that no man can misunderstand it. I call the attention of the Senate to what took place in the other House in relation to adopting rules at the commencement of the session. A member from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the rules of the House of Representatives of the Forty-third Congress shall be the rules of the House of Representatives until otherwise ordered, excepting Rule 166 and Rule 167.

I will state that the first of those rules is one in relation to suspending the rules of the House, with which we have nothing to do; and the other is in relation to dilatory motions, and that was a rule of the House with which the Senate have nothing to do. The same gentleman [Mr. RANDALL] also submitted another resolution—there were two of them—authorizing the Speaker of the House to appoint four Representatives, the Speaker himself to be the fifth member, who should constitute a Committee on Rules in that body. A gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] raised a question of order, that there was no necessity for adopting the rules of the House. He did not state why, but he said:

I rise to a point of order. I object to the resolution under the existing rules; which are our rules without declaration of this sort.

I inferred instantly that they had adopted previously some general rule to extend the rules of the House from one Congress to another; and on looking I find that precisely that thing was done, and that was exactly what Mr. GARFIELD meant.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator state that point again?

Mr. HAMLIN. The gentleman from Ohio raised the question of order that the resolution submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. RANDALL, was not necessary, inasmuch as "the existing rules are our rules without declaration of this sort." Why did Mr. GARFIELD say so? He used no explanatory language; I have read all he said; but on referring to the records of the House we find that in 1869 the House did adopt a resolution declaring that the rules should be the rules of that House and of succeeding Houses until otherwise ordered. That was the question raised, and now I will read the ruling of the Speaker upon it, so clear, so plain, that it seems to me there can be no doubt about it:

The Chair overrules it, on the ground that the Constitution clearly gives to each House the right to adopt its own rules. Whatever may have been the rules or orders of a preceding House in reference to this matter, they cannot supersede the constitutional right of this House to adopt its own rules.

Upon that the resolutions were unanimously agreed to in the House, and the rules of the House were agreed to; but there is no suggestion in that resolution that they shall apply to or that they are meant to apply to the joint rules; and I repeat again that the joint rules of the two Houses have never been adopted at the commencement of any Congress; at least I have been able to find no such case; but they have been operative only by acquiescence.

That being the case, and the Senator from Vermont presenting the resolution to the Senate recommending the agreement of the Senate to the joint rules as they stand, the committee were of opinion that if there were a necessity that the Senate should at this session agree to joint rules there was an equal necessity that the House should also agree to them, and therefore we recommend the amendment of the resolution by making it a concurrent resolution.

My friend from New York [Mr. CONKLING] inquires of me if the committee gave any attention to the twenty-second joint rule. It was a matter of consideration by the committee, but we did not regard it as embraced within the scope of the resolution committed to us to make any suggestion upon it. That is a matter for the consideration of the Senate, and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] has already submitted a motion to exclude that joint rule. If the Senate shall agree to that amendment, the Senate then will have agreed to the joint rules as they stand, except the twenty-second joint rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] excepting the twenty-second joint rule.

Mr. CONKLING. Let it be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "Congress" in the fourth line, it is proposed to insert "excepting the twenty-second joint rule;" so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the joint rules of the Senate and House of Representatives in force at the close of the last session of Congress, excepting the twenty-second joint rule, be, and the same are hereby, adopted as the joint rules of the two Houses for the present session.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Ohio that, if this is likely to lead to debate, it might be well to proceed with the regular morning business first or let the resolution go over until to-morrow.

Mr. THURMAN. I rose for the purpose of asking that it might go over. It will be recollected that when a bill on the subject of this twenty-second joint rule, in regard to the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, was introduced by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] it gave rise to quite an exciting debate, but no action was taken upon it.

Mr. MORTON. It passed the Senate.

Mr. THURMAN. But it did not pass the House.

Mr. MORTON. No.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator from Delaware, who is not in his seat to-day, [Mr. BAYARD,] but will be, I presume, to-morrow, took a very active part in that debate, and I am quite certain that he would wish to be here when the subject shall be considered. I therefore suggest that this business had better lie over at any rate until he returns. I imagine he will be in his seat to-morrow. I move that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio to postpone the consideration of the resolution until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I had an impression that there had been. I think that order had better lie over for inquiry.

Mr. WADLEIGH. There has been no adverse report. The matter was submitted to me at the last session, and I examined the reports that had been made, and they were all favorable so far as made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well.

Mr. HOWE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That five hundred extra copies of the annual report of the Librarian of Congress for the year 1875 be printed, with paper covers, for distribution by the Librarian.

NEUTRALITY BETWEEN SPAIN AND CUBA.

Mr. CONOVER submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That, in compliance with the will of the people, the precedents of history, the best-established principles of international law, the precepts of Christian rule and morality, and the requirements of the commercial and political interests of the United States, and taking into consideration the relations existing between the United States and Spain, and that it is desirable that the reciprocal sentiments of good understanding between the two peoples and governments should not be changed by reason of the grave events which for seven years have taken place in the island of Cuba, the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to declare and maintain the strictest neutrality between the government of Spain and the people of Cuba.

And be it further resolved, That in making the declaration through the usual form of a proclamation, and in order to protect citizens of the United States and merchants and navigators in general from injury in any way for want of precise and clear regulations to govern them in this matter, the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to place in full force and operation the same provisions made and enacted by the government of Her Majesty the Queen of Spain June 17, 1861, on the occasion of the outbreak of the civil war in the United States.

MONUMENTS TO DECEASED MEMBERS.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire and report whether the monuments erected by order of the Senate to the memory of deceased Senators have been placed over the remains of those Senators and suitably inscribed, and also whether there are any deceased Senators not honored by the erection of monuments.

Mr. President, it was the custom long before my recollection to place over the graves of members of Congress who died in Washington and were buried in the Congressional Cemetery uniform monuments, and I believe when members of Congress have died in office, and have not been buried there, their cenotaphs have been erected. I received not long since a letter from the son of a Senator who died in office, and who was buried at the Congressional Cemetery, informing me that the monument to his father was placed at the side of the grave and was not inscribed, owing, probably, to the absence of the proper dates; and, upon inquiry of the proper officer charged with the duty of erecting the monuments and inscribing them, I could find neither the statute under which that practice had been established nor the officer who was charged with the execution of it. If the practice is to prevail, it certainly should be uniform, and I have thought it better that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds inquire into the whole matter.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

OFFICE OF PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, it has been suggested to me by several Senators that the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections in regard to the tenure of office of the President pro tempore of the Senate should properly have been accompanied by a resolution or resolutions embracing the conclusions of the committee. I now, therefore, offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the tenure of office of the President pro tempore of the Senate elected at one session does not expire at the meeting of Congress after the first recess, the Vice-President not having appeared to take the chair.

Resolved, That the death of the Vice-President does not have the effect to vacate the office of President pro tempore of the Senate.

Resolved, That the office of President pro tempore of the Senate is held at the pleasure of the Senate.

Resolved, That Hon. THOMAS W. FERRY, a Senator from Michigan, who was elected President pro tempore of the Senate at the last session, is now the President pro tempore of the Senate by virtue of said election.

Mr. CONKLING. I inquire whether those resolutions are to be printed? Is that part of the Senator's motion?

Mr. MORTON. If the Senator desires their printing, I certainly have no objection.

Mr. CONKLING. I think they had better be printed if we are ever to act upon them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ALLISON in the chair.) The resolutions of the Senator from Indiana will be printed and laid on the table.

Mr. MORTON. If it is desired by the Senator from New York or anybody else that they shall go over, very well; but I would prefer to have them disposed of.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We ought to have an executive session.

Mr. MERRIMON. I inquire whether it is in order to debate the resolutions offered by the Senator from Indiana? I dissented from one feature of the report made by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and desire to have an opportunity to express the grounds of my dissent. I am prepared to do so now, unless it is very desirable to go into executive session. I shall detain the Senate but a few minutes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest to the Senator that it will be much more convenient probably to all of us, who would like to hear the Senator, that we hear his remarks when the matter comes up to-morrow or next day for action.

Mr. MERRIMON. Very well, sir; I am content to take that course.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened.

NATIONAL AND STATE RIGHTS.

Mr. WHYTE. I desire to give notice that when the resolutions offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] in relation to the structure of our Government shall come up for consideration I shall at the proper time present a substitute therefor, which I ask may be now read for information and printed.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the people of the several States, acting in their highest sovereign capacity as free and independent States, adopted the Federal Constitution and established a form of government in the nature of a confederated republic, and for the purpose of carrying into effect the objects for which it was formed delegated to that Government certain rights enumerated in said Constitution, but reserved to the States respectively, or to the people thereof, all the residuary powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States.

The resolution was ordered to be printed.

EXPENDITURES FOR CERTAIN CAPTIVE INDIANS.

Mr. INGALLS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to report to the Senate what amounts have been expended under the appropriation of $300,000 for the support, education, and civilization of three thousand captive Cheyenne, Arapahoe, Kiowa, and Comanche Indians; for what purposes the money has been spent; to whom it has been paid; and whether any Indians have received the benefit of said expenditure.

OFFICE OF PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE.

Mr. MORTON. If no Senator desires to have the resolutions which I offered a few minutes ago go over until to-morrow, I will ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of them now. If any Senator desires a postponement, of course they will go over under the rule.

Mr. MERRIMON. What resolutions are those?

Mr. MORTON. In regard to the President pro tempore.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am ready to go on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves to take up the resolutions which he proposed this morning.

Mr. MORTON. They are before the Senate now.

Mr. THURMAN. Does a single objection carry the resolutions over to to-morrow?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does.

Mr. THURMAN. I think they had better go over till to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio objects.

Mr. MORTON. Then let the resolutions be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They have already been ordered to be printed.

Mr. SPENCER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. THURMAN. I made objection to the consideration of the resolutions of the Senator from Indiana, thinking they related to a wholly different subject from that which I am now informed they affect. The Senator from Indiana informs me now that the resolutions which he offered to take up were those in relation to the President pro tempore. I have no objection to the present consideration of that subject, and therefore I beg leave to withdraw my objection.

Mr. SPENCER. I withdraw the motion to adjourn. I thought there was no business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no objection, the resolutions of the Senator from Indiana are before the Senate, and will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolutions.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I entertain the opinion that when the Senate elects a President pro tempore, the Senator so elected may rightfully continue to hold his office, unless his term as Senator shall sooner terminate or he shall be removed for cause, until the Vice-President shall return to preside over the Senate, and in case he shall fail to so return because of death or other cause, then until a new Vice-President shall be elected and qualified; and I ask the indulgence of the Senate while I state briefly the reasons that have brought me to this conclusion.

The Senate is a perpetual body; it is created, its powers are conferred, defined, and limited by the Constitution. The general laws of parliamentary bodies are applicable to it only so far as the same are not modified by and not inconsistent with the Constitution. It cannot rightfully exercise powers not so conferred; it is not a body possessed of arbitrary powers; it must be governed in all things by the spirit of the Constitution. That it has the physical power to remove at will the President pro tempore I do not deny, because there is no tribunal to review its action, but whether it has the right without reasonable cause to make such removal may well be questioned; indeed, I cannot suppose there could exist any disposition to exercise such arbitrary power. It therefore appears that the Senate is thus governed by the Constitution.

The Vice-President is President of the Senate and he is beyond the control of that body, because the Constitution makes him so. It provides in terms no less definite and no less binding another officer to supply his place in his absence. The clause containing that provision is in these words:

> The Senate shall choose their other officers, and also a President pro tempore in the absence of the Vice-President, or when he shall exercise the office of President of the United States.

This clause is mandatory; the Senate must choose its officers, other than its president, and a President pro tempore as well and as surely as any other, when the contingency requiring one shall arise. This officer is not at the option of the Senate; he is essential, as absolutely so as any other known to our system of government. If the Vice-President shall be absent, the Senate cannot proceed lawfully with business for one hour without this officer, and plainly because the Constitution commands that in that case such officer shall be elected. The Senate may determine what other officers it will have, but this officer it must have; he is designated. He may be not improperly styled an officer provided by the Constitution.

What, then, is the term of his office? The words "shall choose * * * also a President pro tempore" plainly and necessarily imply for during the time of the absence of the Vice-President from the Senate for any cause. The term or phrase pro tempore, has a very general meaning. It implies, generally, for the time, the occasion, the exigency; as if the president of the national convention of one of our political parties should be temporarily absent, in that case, by the general law of parliamentary bodies, a temporary presiding officer would be appointed or elected to supply his place during such absence. Such officer would be styled president or presiding officer pro tempore, and he would continue to preside until the return of the regular president, and an adjournment to a day certain would not displace him unless he should be removed. The time of the absence of the president in that case is the time, the occasion, the exigency, to be supplied. This rule, as thus stated, applies to all deliberative bodies governed by general parliamentary law. But the special meaning of the term pro tempore must be ascertained by its use in a particular case, and so in the case now under consideration.

The Senate is required to have always a presiding officer, and the Constitution provides that "in the absence of the Vice-President, or when he shall exercise the office of President of the United States," the Senate shall make one which is designated by name as President pro tempore—that is, for the time of such absence. To say that the power conferred to appoint pro tempore, may be for one sitting of the Senate, for one hour, a day, a month, a session, or at the will of the Senate, does not meet the case provided for: the purpose is to supply a certain, fixed presiding officer for the time the regular officer shall be absent, whether that be long or short. He may be absent for a day, for a whole session, or for his whole term of office, and that absence is the measure of time to be supplied by the President pro tempore. The term of such an officer could not be fixed by more definite terms; no other words could describe or fix his term more aptly; it is as certain as if it had provided for a year or four years, and nothing is left to discretion. If this view is not correct, then what is the true measure of time? And who shall determine it? If it is said the Senate, then whence the power? The power is expressly given to elect and the term is fixed as definitely as language can make it: no power is given to limit the term, either in words or by necessary implication. To say that the Senate can determine the term of office thus fixed by the Constitution, and that without cause, is shocking to the legal mind! If the office were one created by the Senate, then it may fix the term and determine it; but that is not the case: here the office is fixed, designated, and the term limited by the Constitution itself.

The President pro tempore is an officer in the sense of the Constitution; he is, in the Senate, in the place of the Vice-President. He exercises the same power. He is clothed with important powers; grave duties devolve upon him, and he enjoys privileges which necessarily imply duration; he is amenable to the Senate for the just and proper exercise of these powers, and great responsibility attaches to him as such officer. The Constitution makes him an officer in the full sense of that term: in point of time, power, opportunity, privilege, and, indeed, in every respect pertinent and lawful. He is not a mere occupant of the chair by the courtesy or will of the Senate; he is more than that; he presides not by courtesy, but by right; he exercises high powers, not by the toleration of a majority, but by the sanction of the Constitution; his official character is recognized by the other branch of Congress, by the Executive and Judicial Departments of the Government, and his official acts are good to all intents and purposes whenever or wherever called in question.

The framers of the Constitution well understood that by the general parliamentary law, the Senate could make a temporary presiding officer, who would be subject to its will and pleasure. Then the significant question presents itself, why the provision in question? Was it mere surplusage—only in affirmance of the general parliamentary law? By no rule of construction can it be so construed, if it can have another reasonable meaning; indeed, a purpose and different meaning must be assigned, if this can reasonably be done. Can this be done? It is manifest that it can. The plain purpose was to provide a different officer from the one allowed by the general parliamentary law: one not at the will and pleasure of the Senate, but one like the Vice-President, beyond its arbitrary control, one free and independent, one not subject to the whim of the hour, or the caprice and changing intrigues of political parties. The manifest object was to provide an officer as nearly independent as might be. The same conservative spirit that dictated the nature, character, form, and independence of the Senate suggested the wisdom of making the presiding officer of that body as free and independent as possible. It was deemed unwise to make an officer so dignified and important the mere tool of a party or a majority, by making him subject to their will and pleasure. This view makes the provision of the Constitution in question operative, and answers a wholesome, indeed, a necessary, purpose, in view of the nature and purposes of the Senate. Any other makes it nonsensical and nugatory.

One or two supposed and not impossible cases will serve to illustrate how reasonable and very appropriate is such an officer in the view just submitted. Suppose the party majority here were two; that three of that majority should die, how would it comport with the dignity of this body, its character, its nature, and its purposes, and our system of government, for the minority, thus turned into a majority, at once and without cause to turn out the President pro tempore and put in one to suit their will and pleasure? Again, suppose in the faithful discharge of duty, the President pro tempore should feel constrained to make a ruling distasteful to the majority, how would it appear to see him turned out of office by the arbitrary will of a furious majority? A President pro tempore thus at the will and pleasure of a party or factious majority would have a high temptation to prostitute his office to base and ignoble purposes. The object was to place him above temptation by placing him above the general parliamentary rule, by making him an officer of the Constitution with a fixed term. The purpose of the Constitution is not to subserve the ends and purposes of parties and party intrigues or an occasion, but to secure wholesome government for the benefit of the whole people.

The objection to this view, that the Senate, like other parliamentary bodies, ought to have absolute control of its presiding officer, weighs little or nothing, because the Constitution has placed the Vice-President, the President of the Senate, beyond its control. In this there is a manifest purpose to depart from the general parliamentary law, and I have endeavored to show that this purpose was kept up and further secured, by providing a presiding officer pro tempore. This provision is in aid of a fixed policy to place the presiding officer of this body beyond factious or partisan control. And this is both reasonable and wise.

It may be asked, What would be the condition of the Senate if both the President and the President pro tempore should be absent? I submit, in reply, that it was supposed by the framers of the Constitution that the provision made was sufficient for all practical purposes, and so a long experience has proved it to be. If such a case should arise, then the general law would necessarily apply, and the Senate could appoint an occasional presiding officer, who would vacate the chair on the return of either of the regular ones.

One such case, and I believe only one, did happen. In that case, on the return of the President pro tempore, the occasional officer vacated the chair and the Senate re-elected the President pro tempore; but there was no necessity to do so. This must have been done out of abundant caution. The matter was not questioned or debated, and, like all such precedents, passes for very little.

Mr. Jefferson says in his Manual that—

> In the Senate, a President pro tempore in the absence of the Vice-President is proposed and chosen by ballot. His office is understood— > to be determined on the Vice-President's appearing and taking the chair, or at the meeting of the Senate after the first recess.

I emphasize that word—

It will be observed that this is only a note, and can scarcely be regarded as expressing his own opinion, for he says it is "understood," &c. It is known that he wrote his Manual between 1797 and 1800, and prior to that time in two instances, the President pro tempore at the last session was present at the beginning of the next succeeding session and in the then absence of the Vice-President he did not take the chair, but a new President pro tempore was then elected. The note of Mr. Jefferson is, it seems, based upon these precedents. There were two similar cases: one in 1802 and one in 1803. These four cases are all of that kind. No question was made and there was no debate in any one of them; the action was taken without objection or examination, and it cannot be claimed that they have much, if any, weight. The researches of our very able and excellent Chief Clerk, Mr. McDonald, show that from 1803 down to the present time, the uniform practice has been that the President pro tempore continues in office at a succeeding session in the absence of the Vice-President without re-election, and he cites forty-nine cases of this kind; and there are but four of the first kind, which happened at an early period in the Government and without question or consideration.

It is a fact worthy of note that in no case has the Senate ever exercised the power to remove the President pro tempore, and I venture with confidence to say, that no authority for it can be cited outside of the general parliamentary law, and we have seen that this does not apply.

It is provided by section 9 of the act of March 1, 1792—

> That in case of removal, death, resignation, or inability both of the President and Vice-President of the United States, the President of the Senate pro tempore, and in case there shall be no President of the Senate, then the Speaker of the House of Representatives for the time being shall act as President of the United States until the disability be removed or a President shall be elected.

Here is a strong legislative declaration of opinion at least, that the President pro tempore is not only an officer of the Government, but that he is an officer recognized and established by the Constitution, because the act was passed to carry into effect clause 5, of article 2, of that instrument, which provides:

> In case of the removal of the President from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the Vice-President, and the Congress may by law provide for the case of removal, death, resignation, or inability, both of the President and Vice-President, declaring what officer shall then act as President, and such officer shall act accordingly, until the disability be removed, or a President shall be elected.

That act has remained upon the statute-book to this day without modification or alteration, and has received, at least, the implied sanction during all that time of the American people, Congress, and all political parties that have from time to time controlled the fortunes of the Government.

By the act of August 16, 1856, the President pro tempore, when there shall be no Vice-President or when he shall act as President of the United States, shall receive the compensation provided by law for the Vice-President, and thus is there a further legislative recognition of the permanency of this office.

Can it be that it ever was contemplated that such an officer should be at the will and pleasure of the Senate? Nay, at the beck and bidding of party intrigue and furious factions? The language, the spirit, the policy of the Constitution forbid it; the practice of the Senate and the legislation of Congress, so far as these bear on the subject, alike forbid it. Suppose the case, that pending the term of the President pro tempore the Vice-President should die, what a shameful spectacle might be presented by party or faction trying to turn him out of office, to the end that some favorite of the majority or a faction in the Senate might become the President of the United States in case of the death of the President? If the incumbent should be a man of nerve, spirit, and great popularity, such an attempt might lead to disastrous public disturbance and revolution. It will be fortunate for the country if the law shall be so settled as to forbid and prevent such unhappy contingencies. There is no reason why it should not be so determined; there are the gravest reasons why it should be; and I have hastily glanced at some of them.

Then, by the terms and spirit of the Constitution, upon sound principle and wise policy, sanctioned more or less directly and indirectly by the practice of the Senate and Congress, the President pro tempore is an officer of the Constitution, having a fixed and continuous term, depending on the presence or absence of the Vice-President, which the Senate has no power to determine except for lawful cause.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I do not propose to occupy more than a few moments of the time of the Senate, but I cannot concur entirely with the views which have just been expressed by the Senator from North Carolina, and I desire to say in the commencement of the remarks which I have to make that I regard this not as a question appertaining at all to the present incumbent of the chair, but as a question purely of a legal character, involving the rights and powers of this body. It rises above any considerations of a private character, because it affects the dignity and powers of the Senate itself. If it were a question involving any personal rights, I should take it on myself to say that so far as I have observed the action of the present incumbent of the office no man could have discharged the duties more satisfactorily to the body; no one could have acted with greater courtesy and urbanity to all; and he has displayed an impartiality and ability that entitle him to the regard and consideration of every member of the Senate.

But, sir, it is not a question affecting private rights, but a question involving, as I before said, the rights of the Senate—the right of this body to change at its pleasure the Presiding Officer of the body.

The only provision in the Constitution which refers to it is found in the fifth clause of the third section of the first article, which was quoted by the Senator from North Carolina. The Senator infers, from the fact that there is a specific authority given to elect a President pro tempore, that the Speaker pro tempore is named, that it was intended thereby that he was to be distinguished from other officers in respect to the tenure of his office and the power and authority of the Senate over such officer. I dissent from that view. The reason why he is specifically named in that clause is very apparent from the face of the clause of the Constitution referred to.

The Constitution had provided in the preceding clause for the Senate a presiding officer, the Vice-President of the United States; and unless there had been a special provision of the Constitution as to who should preside over this body in the absence of the Vice-President there would have been no authority whatever in the Senate of the United States to choose its presiding officer. I hold that but for the provision here inserted in the Constitution the death or absence of the Vice-President would have left this body entirely without a presiding officer, and incapable from any inherent power in the Senate as a deliberative body to provide one. It would have been in the precise condition that the House of Commons in England is, which to-day cannot elect a Speaker pro tempore except by the consent and approval of the Crown. And so, but for this special provision authorizing the Senate of the United States to provide a President pro tempore in case of the death or absence of the Vice-President, this body would have had no power to select its own presiding officer; and hence it is that that clause is specifically inserted delegating authority to the Senate in case of the absence or death of the Vice-President, or when he shall exercise the office of President of the United States, to provide a presiding officer. For this reason he is specifically named in the Constitution, while the "other officers" are not named.

Now, I differ from the conclusions of the honorable Senator as to the results which would follow provided the Senate had not the power to choose. I cannot concur in the view entertained by some, that when we have once elected a President pro tempore we have exhausted the power which is conferred by the provision of the Constitution authorizing the selection of a President pro tempore. If that view is correct, what is the consequence? Then, if your President pro tempore should die, you have no inherent power to select a successor to him, and you have no authority in the Constitution, and you see at once that the consequence would be that the business of the Senate must stop. Or, to trace that doctrine out to its logical consequences: suppose you elect a President pro tempore and he fails to discharge the functions of his office—it is not probable that he would do so, but it is within the possibilities—suppose he should refuse to receive any communication from the House of Representatives; suppose he should refuse to receive any message from the President of the United States; suppose he should refuse to sign the bills that were passed by Congress, you have no power of removal by electing another President pro tempore to supersede him, because according to this doctrine, having executed the power granted, the power is exhausted and you can go no further.

Mr. MERRIMON. I beg to interrupt my friend. He misapprehends my position entirely. I said that the Senate had power to remove him for cause—lawful cause. The case put would be a case where there would be cause. I maintain that his office as Senator while he is a member of the Senate remains intact, and for any act that he might commit he might be dealt with as a Senator though he be the presiding officer.

Mr. SAULSBURY. My answer to that is that, so far as I read the Constitution, it was not absolutely necessary that the Senate should have chosen a President from its own body. There may be a provision of law to that effect somewhere, but the Constitution is silent as to who may be chosen. It distinctly says that the Senate may choose a President pro tempore; but it does not say that it shall select him out of its own body. Suppose the President pro tempore should not be also a Senator, how then would you reach him for failure to perform the duties of his office? But suppose it to be true that there is a provision which requires that the President pro tempore shall be selected from among the Senators; suppose that the Senator presiding as President pro tempore should discharge every duty incumbent on him as a Senator; suppose he votes and discharges his duties as a Senator, but fails to discharge his duties as President pro tempore, how would you reach him? The only manner in which you could affect him, according to the doctrine that I think is here contended for, is by his removal from this body as a Senator, by expelling him, and in that way reaching him as President pro tempore.

Well, sir, if he had discharged his duties faithfully as a Senator, conducted himself with perfect propriety, performed the duties and functions pertaining to his office as a Senator, I see not how you are to reach him, because it is not to be presumed that the Senate would act unjustly, and for the purpose of removing a President pro tempore, whose office is entirely distinct and separate from his office as Senator. It is not to be supposed that in order to reach him in that capacity you would be unjust and turn him out of the Senate if he had discharged his duties as a Senator; for let it be observed that the function of his office as President pro tempore is not a function pertaining to his office as a Senator of the State he represents.

Mr. MERRIMON. I will interrupt my friend a moment to explain further my dissent from that view, and will do it in aid of the view I submitted a while ago. I insist that a part of the duty of a Senator under the Constitution is that if he shall be designated by the Senate to preside as President pro tempore he shall so act; it is one of the duties that devolve upon him as a Senator, and therefore, if any Senator on this floor were designated to-day to preside in the chair and should obstinately refuse to do it, that would be ground for dealing with him as a Senator. The Constitution devolves the obligation on him to discharge that duty as much as any other, if the Senate shall assign it to him.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I differ entirely from the view of the Senator from North Carolina. I was proceeding to say that you have no power, according to the argument of the Senator, traced to its logical results, to reach him for any cause whatever; for, according to his argument, the Senate having exercised the grant of power contained in the Constitution to choose a President pro tempore, your power becomes exhausted, and you cannot again exercise that power in any respect.

But let us trace this still further in its consequences. He is an officer of the Senate. He is not a civil officer; and for the proper discharge of his duties, you cannot reach him except as an officer of the Senate. You cannot reach him by impeachment. The House of Representatives has no right to prefer articles of impeachment against a Senator, and you cannot try him, therefore, upon any articles of impeachment. He is, therefore, not a civil officer of the Government in the ordinary and usual acceptation of that term, but his office is one purely as an officer of the Senate, elected by its votes, exercising his functions alone for the orderly transaction of the business of the Senate, responsible to the Senate, removable at the will and pleasure of the Senate. Being an officer of the Senate alone, his relation to the Senate differs from that of the other officers of this body only in its greater dignity and the nature of the duties it enjoins.

Now, sir, in submitting these remarks, which have been very hastily thrown out, and I am sure are very crude, I only want to maintain and uphold the authority of the body, so that, when it shall have either an inefficient officer or one who fails to discharge properly the function of his office in the chair, the power may be asserted in this body to provide another officer who will discharge his duties; and I am sure that no one who knows me will attribute any remarks which I utter as being intended to apply to the present very efficient and very able Presiding Officer of this body. My sole purpose is to maintain what I conceive to be indispensably and absolutely necessary: the right of this body to change its officers whenever in its pleasure it becomes proper to do so.

These are all the remarks which I propose at the present time to submit on this question.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, I agree in all that has been said by the committee in the report except what is stated in their last conclusion, and I concur entirely with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] in the views he has expressed in regard to this case.

Whatever might have been the construction of the Constitution before the act of March 1, 1792, was passed, it is very clear that that act must have great weight in the consideration of the question before us. It is not enough to show, therefore, by the terms of the Constitution, that the President pro tempore of the Senate is an officer of the Senate, and under those provisions alone would be removable at the pleasure of the Senate. It is possible that such a construction would have been warranted before the act of 1792 was passed; but the Constitution gave to Congress the right to say, and that body has said, what officers shall succeed to the office of President in the event of the death of the President and Vice-President. While it may be true, therefore, that the Constitution intended to place the President of the Senate under the control of this body and make him removable at its pleasure, if no legislation was had under the first section of the second article of the Constitution, which empowers Congress to provide for filling the office of President when the two first officers in the Government are dead or are removed, still, the last provision in the Constitution gives Congress the power to change the tenure of the office of the President of the Senate when it gives it authority to say that the person who fills it in a certain exigency shall be President of the United States.

If the power conferred upon Congress touching the filling of the office of President of the United States be in conflict with that which is supposed to exist on the part of this body to remove its presiding officer, then reasonable construction must decide the question at issue. It is not enough to say that the President pro tempore of the Senate, like the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, is an officer of this body, and because the Sergeant-at-Arms may be removed by the Senate, so may the President pro tempore be removed. This mode of reasoning would be admissible if Congress under the Constitution had not pointed out duties beyond the Senate for the one officer in a certain contingency which it has not prescribed for the other.

This is the great point, in my opinion, upon which this debate must turn.

If Congress has the right (which no one will deny) to cast upon the President pro tempore of the Senate the office of President of the United States when the President and Vice-President are dead, and in order to guard against doubts and uncertainties in a matter of so much importance, it becomes necessary that the tenure of office of the President of the Senate should be fixed, can it be said that the right to remove such officer on the part of the Senate should supersede the right of Congress to designate him as heir expectant of the presidency? Or, to put the proposition in another shape, if Congress under an express provision of the Constitution has the right to cast upon the President of the Senate duties and powers, either in presenti or in expectantcy, which are in conflict, or which may come in conflict, with the right of the Senate to remove such officer, derived by implication, which power shall prevail? The right of this body to remove this officer is a right derived by implication, while the other right exercised by Congress is in virtue of an express power given by the Constitution. The Constitution made it the duty of Congress to declare by law what officer shall exercise the executive office of the nation when left vacant by both the President and Vice-President. Congress accordingly has provided that in such a contingency the office shall be filled by the President of the Senate or the Speaker of the House for the time being. Congress was not invested with the general power to fill the office; but the Constitution requires that it shall provide by law what officer shall act as President in such an exigency. Law, as defined by a great master of jurisprudence, is a rule of action, prescribed by the supreme power in the state commanding what is right and forbidding what is wrong. It is distinguishable from a sudden and transient order proceeding from the whims and caprices of despots. It implies permanency and uniformity, and is prescribed or published in order that all may know the duties it enjoins and the penalties which its violation will incur.

The law then designates the President pro tempore of the Senate as the officer who shall succeed to the presidency in the contingency mentioned. How will this law operate with the right asserted in behalf of this body to remove that officer at its pleasure? Remember that the law provides that if there be no President pro tempore of the Senate the Speaker of the House shall act as President. All experience teaches us that nothing is more dangerous to the peace and security of nations than those conflicts which arise out of disputes about the right to the chief office in the State.

Nothing can be more important to the safety of the Republic and liberties of the people than the removal of all doubt, or the means of creating doubt, as to the persons entitled to the office of President of the United States. Persons with doubtful titles may, and often do, get into the local or subordinate offices; but let any man enter the office of President of the United States whom a majority of the people of this country believe is not entitled to it, and they would be tempted to remove him by force. There was a time in the history of the country when it was not considered sound to reason from the existence of a power to the abuse of it. We have all seen enough in our day and time to convince us that the only real danger to which this grand fabric of government is exposed is the excitement, passion, and conflicts resulting from party spirit.

I am not unaware that as a member of the minority of this body, entertaining hopes that a change will take place in the political complexion of the majority, my interest and the interests of those with whom I act here lies in a different direction from the one in which my argument leads me; but, sir, while feeling, as all do, the influence of party attachment and principles, I think, sir, I feel more strongly at this time the necessity of using the little power at my command in strengthening every rampart which the Constitution has erected for the protection and security of our liberties. This body we know is subject to change. It has changed in the past and it will change in the future. It has never yet happened, I believe, that a President of this body was called to the office of President; but it may happen at any time. True wisdom requires that we should always be prepared for what is possible to occur.

We know that occasions may arise when this body and the other House will feel the force of excitement sure to result from a vacancy in the executive office. We are without a Vice-President to-day. There is but one step from the chair of the Senate to that of the nation. Who can tell what a day may bring forth? There is no greater security for the life of a prince than exists for the life of a beggar.

> Within the hollow crown,
> That rounds the mortal temples of a king,
> Keeps death his court; and there the antic sits,
> Scoffing his state, and grinning at his pomp;
> Allowing him a breath, a little scene
> To monarchize, be fear'd, and kill with looks;
> Infusing him with self and vain conceit,—
> As if this flesh, which walls about our life,
> Were brass impregnable; and humor'd thus,
> Comes at the last, and with a little pin
> Bores through his castle wall, and—farewell king!

With the absolute power of removal over the officer who is designated by law to fill the office of President, if the occasion should arise, which I pray it may not, for putting in practice this part of our Constitution, to what intrigue and political excitement would not this power lead in the Senate when it was within its competency to designate the man who should occupy the first place in the nation! The power given in the Constitution to the Senate to choose its own President would in that event be converted into a power to elect a President of the United States. But, sir, this is the body which has the power to remove from office by impeachment. A large partisan majority here and in the other House may remove both the President and Vice-President, and they may be prompted to do this by the hope of getting some favorite into the presidential office. Mark you that in case of the removal of both the President and Vice-President the Senate, under the rule insisted upon on the other side, would elect the President. Is it wise to give to that tribunal which alone has the power under the Constitution of removing the President and Vice-President absolute power to name their successor? Need it be said, sir, that little checks like the one we advocate in this case might prove sufficient to save the state? This very power of the Senate to elect or remove a President at pleasure might lead to combinations and conspiracies to promote the fortunes of particular men. I do not argue now from the virtues or vices of any party, but I argue from the known passions, weaknesses, and imperfections of human nature itself. True, there are some powers I would not give to any party, and all that I say on this subject I intend to apply to all political organizations.

Why is it that the question now under debate has been brought before us? No complaint has ever been made against the gentleman in the chair on account of the manner in which he has performed his duties. No one supposes that this subject would now be agitated had we not lost the Vice-President. And what does this show? It shows that the Senate is looking beyond the office of President of the Senate, and, recognizing the uncertainties of life, is anxious about the person who might be called to the first office in the Government. And this, in my opinion, is not what the Constitution intended. It did not mean that the Senate should say who should be President in the exigency stated. If it did, very strange language has been employed to convey this meaning. But the Constitution gave Congress the power to decide this question, and that body has designated the officer. According to our view the President of the Senate, selected without reference to any higher duties than belong to that office, would in the emergency mentioned succeed to the Presidency. In the other case the Senate would have the power while complying with the letter of the law, and furnishing an officer for the vacancy filling the description in the statute, to exercise in its choice as to the person who should be placed at the head of the Government. Let the present situation illustrate the question. The present Presiding Officer was elected at a time when no thought was entertained of the death of the Vice-President. He was liable to be superseded at any moment by the latter officer. If during the absence of the Vice-President he and the President died, were removed, or resigned, Mr. FERRY would have become President. In that case there would have been no opportunity for the Senate to engage in a contest about the succession under one view of the law. But how would the case stand under the other view? Should sickness or accident imperil the life of the Chief Magistrate, then the Senate would have the power to exercise a choice as to the person who might be called to the Presidency. The selection of a President pro tempore of the Senate under such circumstances would become a selection of a President of the United States. And will any man say, or can he say, that with such a momentous issue cast upon this body there would not be much of the feeling, the acrimony, passion, and excitement, and with them much of the danger attending an ordinary election for that high officer?

But, sir, this is not all. As I said awhile ago, the Constitution provides that if there be no President pro tempore of the Senate the Speaker of the House, in the emergency stated, shall act as President. Remember now that while this body may bind its own members by its decision respecting the capacities and powers of its own Presiding Officer, so far as these relate to his ordinary duties in this body, it cannot claim the right to bind, and it cannot bind by any decision it may make, the other House of Congress in regard to this right of removal, in so far as that right involves the question of title to the Presidency. The House of Representatives being equally interested in this question with the Senate, has a right to decide for itself. And while this body may confirm this report and affirm that the Speaker of the House is removable at the will and pleasure of that body, and that therefore the President of the Senate is removable at the pleasure of this. And I would say here, by way of parenthesis, that the conclusion arrived at is because the Speaker of the House is removable at the will and pleasure of that body the President pro tempore is likewise removable by this.

Mr. MERRIMON. What authority is there for saying that the Speaker of the House may be removed at the will of the House?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. None. The people's Representatives may possibly come to a different conclusion, and they may say, as they have the right to say, that their Speaker holds his office for two years and is not removable at pleasure, and that the presiding officer of this body holds his office by a like tenure. It is hardly necessary for me to say what conclusion this reasoning will justify. If the Senate should act upon the theory of this report and displace their President when in the judgment of the House they had no right to do so, and a vacancy occurred in the office of President, the House might be found claiming the office of President of the United States for their Speaker and the Senate for their President. This condition of things could never result from the law as we understand it; for, although the House might believe in the power of removal as set up in this report and the Senate in a fixed tenure of office, no harm could come from such a difference. This is all I have to say on this part of the case.

I contend that by the very words of the Constitution the power of removal does not exist. The Constitution gives to the Senate the right to elect a President pro tempore in the absence of the Vice-President. Upon the appearance of the latter officer the right of the former to the chair terminates. The language is:

> The Senate shall choose their other officers, and also a President pro tempore, in the absence of the Vice-President, or when he shall exercise the office of President of the United States.

The language in regard to the Speakership is:

> The House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers.

No one who has studied the Constitution can fail to detect the pointed difference in the language employed in the two cases. The Senate is not to choose their President pro tempore and other officers, but their own officers and a President pro tempore.

It is not denied in the report of the committee that the Vice-President, when presiding over the Senate, holds his position independent of our pleasure. He is not liable to be displaced at the will of a majority. He is entitled to preside as long as he holds his office. And who can say that the framers of the Constitution, in providing for a permanent presiding officer of this body, did not consider it important that he should be clothed with independence in that important station? Every parliamentary body is composed of partisans, and these are divided into a majority and minority numbers. The rules or constitution of all such bodies are intended in a great measure to protect the rights of the minority. The majority can always protect itself. Nothing is more important to the fair and just application or enforcement of these rules than a presiding officer who can hold with an even hand the scales of justice between the majority and the minority. He is to some extent a judge. He is expected to decide many questions affecting the parties in the house, and all agree that he ought to decide fairly. How is this object to be attained? or is it so unimportant that no provision should be made to secure it? If it is an end worthy of attention, can anything be more plain than that the complete independence of the presiding officer, if not absolutely essential, will contribute very greatly in securing fairness and impartiality in the discharge of his duties? This is the more important in the Senate because of the long tenure of our offices. Under our system the great corrective power is with the people, and in the other House if any man abuses his power he may be brought to account before his constituents in two years. But here it is necessary to have some safeguards for the rights of the minority outside of the people. In the case of the President of the Senate it is to be found in the independence with which he is clothed. If it is wise and proper that the permanent presiding officer of this body should be independent, is it not equally so that the President pro tempore should be? It is possible that an officer of the latter character might preside over this body for four years. A President pro tempore must preside when the Vice-President acts as President, and this has already occurred more than once in our history, and for nearly the whole term of the office.

Mr. President, it is well known that there was but one parliamentary body in the world at the time of the adoption of our Constitution whose history was looked to as an example by the men who devised the organization of this and the other House of Congress. That was the English House of Commons. Upon this subject none of the ancient republics afforded any light. They were governed by no fixed laws; indeed they were rude democracies, where violence and tumult often reigned supreme. The English Commons was at that time a model parliamentary body. Some of the most extraordinary statesmen and orators of the world had, before the time I speak of, rendered it famous by the display of their genius and eloquence. Besides, it was the body in which the great questions that drove the American Colonies into revolution were discussed, and it attracted for many years the most intense interest on this continent. Throughout the Federalist it is constantly referred to, which shows that it had been well studied by the leading men of the revolutionary era. All the Colonial Legislatures were formed after this great model, and it can hardly be doubted that when this body and the other House were created it was expected that the powers and duties of the officers who should fill these respective offices would be similar to those of the officers of the English House. That body always had a speaker and a sergeant-at-arms. The speaker was always elected from among the returned members. Our Constitution, in providing for the election of a Speaker, did not deem it necessary to say that he should be selected from among the members of the House. The English practice, like the great source of light in judicial difficulties, the common law, settled the question. Now what was the law governing the subject under debate in the English House of Commons at the time of the adoption of our Constitution? The report of the committee says that the speaker of the other House holds his office at the pleasure of that body; and the same rule must prevail here in regard to the President pro tempore. The Constitution is silent upon the subject, and reason and authority are all that we have to guide us. The law in force in the House of Commons then and now is that the speaker shall hold his office during the whole Parliament, unless by resignation or death a vacancy arises.

One more point and I will conclude. The Constitution gives to the Senate the right to choose a President pro tempore in the absence of the Vice-President. This is an express power, limited to a particular case. From whence does the power of removal come? It is not written in the Constitution. Where does the Senate obtain the right to exercise an implied power, for such the power of removal is in this case? Are there any implied powers vested by the Constitution in Congress? Yes. But in whom or what department? The Constitution declares that—

> The Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

Congress, and Congress alone, is the authority which the Constitution has invested with the right to carry into execution all implied powers. And if Congress should say that the Senate might remove its President it would bind the other House, and thus avoid the difficulties pointed out in the forepart of my argument.

With these observations, Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CRAGIN in the chair.) The question is on the passage of the resolutions.

Mr. MERRIMON. I move to amend by striking out the third and fourth resolutions.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest to the Senator from North Carolina, as these are separate resolutions and may be voted upon separately, that it is much more convenient to take the question as each resolution comes up.

Mr. MERRIMON. On that suggestion I withdraw my motion, and ask for a division of the question upon the resolutions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A division is called for. The question is on the first resolution; which will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the tenure of a President pro tempore of the Senate elected at one session does not expire at the meeting of Congress after the first recess, the Vice-President not having appeared to take the chair.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I want to emphasize the matter. This resolution is adopted unanimously. It is a resolution that affects the organization of the body for all time to come and establishes a precedent. I intended to call for the yeas and nays, but I will not do so as the resolution has passed unanimously.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CRAGIN in the chair.) As far as the Chair could distinguish, it was passed unanimously. The second resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the death of the Vice-President does not have the effect to vacate the office of President pro tempore of the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. Merely to have the precedent settled, I venture to call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. THURMAN. By unanimous consent we can have the yeas and nays on the first as well as the second resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. I speak of the first.

Mr. THURMAN. We have got to the second, but we could go back to the first by unanimous consent and take the yeas and nays on that, and then on the second.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the yeas and nays will be taken on the first resolution. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. WHYTE. Let the first resolution be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the tenure of a President pro tempore of the Senate elected at one session does not expire at the meeting of Congress after the first recess, the Vice-President not having appeared to take the chair.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted– yeas 59, nays none; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Clayton, Cockrell, Conkling, Conover, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Dawes, Dennis, Dorsey, Eaton, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Kernan, Key, McCreery, McDonald, McMillan, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Randolph, Ransom, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, Wallace, West, Whyte, Withers, and Wright—59.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cameron of Pennsylvania, Caperton, English, Ferry, Hitchcock, Johnston, Jones of Nevada, Logan, Maxey, Morrill of Maine, Paddock, Robertson, and Windom—13.

So the resolution was adopted unanimously.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next question is on the second resolution; which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the death of the Vice-President does not have the effect to vacate the office of President pro tempore of the Senate.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays for the same reason they were had on the other resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 62, nays none; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Caperton, Christiancy, Clayton, Cockrell, Conkling, Conover, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Dawes, Dennis, Dorsey, Eaton, Edmunds, English, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Kernan, Key, McCreery, McDonald, McMillan, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Randolph, Ransom, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, Wallace, West, Whyte, Windom, Withers, and Wright—62.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cameron of Pennsylvania, Ferry, Hitchcock, Johnston, Jones of Nevada, Logan, Maxey, Paddock, Robertson, and Spencer—10.

So the resolution was adopted unanimously.

Mr. ENGLISH. I was not in my seat when my name was called on the first resolution. I ask leave to vote.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is against the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. After the result has been declared the rule does not allow a name to be recorded. The question is now on the third resolution.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to say a very few words on this resolution; but first let it be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The third resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the office of President pro tempore of the Senate is held at the pleasure of the Senate.

Mr. THURMAN. The solution of this question is perhaps somewhat difficult, although it is within a narrow compass; and it depends, I imagine, upon the inquiry whether the words "pro tempore," in the clause of the Constitution that has been read, are used in that instrument in a technical parliamentary sense or whether their meaning is fixed by the context of the clause in which they occur. If they are used in a technical parliamentary sense, then it seems to be admitted on all hands that the President pro tempore is subject to removal like the Speaker pro tempore of the House, in case there should be such an officer there, or any other pro tempore official. In other words, according to the technical parliamentary sense of the words "pro tempore" in relation to the tenure of an officer, they mean the same as "durante bene placito"—during our good pleasure.

But it is said and argued with great force by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] and the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES] that these words are not used in a mere technical parliamentary sense, but that their meaning is fixed by the context of the clause in which they occur; and that is, "The Senate shall choose their other officers, and also a President pro tempore, in the absence of the Vice-President, or when he shall exercise the office of President of the United States." It is argued with force that it is not said that the Senate shall choose a President pro tempore, to hold his office during the good pleasure of the Senate; that there is no such limitation as that "during the pleasure of the Senate;" and it is said further that the "tempus" that is contemplated here is the absence of the Vice-President, or his discharge of the duties of President, which necessitates his absence, or is another case of absence; and it must be admitted that, looking at the clause, giving it a natural construction, there is great force in that argument. They shall choose also a President pro tempore in the absence of the Vice-President or when he shall exercise the office of President of the United States. Whenever the Vice-President shall exercise the office of the President of the United States the Senate shall choose "a President pro tempore," not a President to-day and another to-morrow and another the day after, to hold merely during the pleasure of the Senate, but a President pro tempore for that occasion, for that time. There certainly is very great force in this view of the Constitution, and there is also very great force in the reasons that have been suggested of a more enlarged and general nature. Nevertheless, Mr. President, I cannot say that I am perfectly clear in my own mind which construction ought to prevail; and inasmuch as the question as now before us is a mere abstract question; as it is not necessary for us to determine it at all, and it cannot become necessary for us to determine it after the passage of the first and second resolutions unless somebody shall move to proceed to the election of a President pro tempore, and thus to displace the present incumbent; as we have unanimously voted that he is rightfully President pro tempore now, and nobody has yet moved to displace him by proceeding to another election, it is very obvious that any decision we might make upon this third resolution at this time would be what lawyers call obiter dictum. I therefore, in order that the matter may undergo further reflection and consideration before we decide upon it, move to lay the third resolution upon the table.

Mr. MORTON. And cut off debate?

Mr. THURMAN. If anybody wishes to debate, I will not do it.

Mr. CONKLING. Move to postpone it indefinitely.

Mr. THURMAN. Well, I move to postpone the third resolution; but perhaps a motion to postpone indefinitely looks like deciding against it.

Mr. CONKLING. Not more than laying it on the table.

Mr. THURMAN. If it is laid on the table, it can be taken up again. But, however, wishing it understood that I do not consider that a vote to postpone it indefinitely is necessarily a vote against the resolution of the committee, as we may postpone it indefinitely for the reason which I have given, that there is no case now before the Senate requiring our action upon this resolution because there is no motion made to proceed to the election of a President pro tempore, I move that the resolution be postponed indefinitely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio moves to postpone the resolution now under consideration indefinitely.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio has so much surprised me by his expression of a doubt upon this subject that in order that I may reflect upon the matter I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at two o'clock and forty-two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has now expired. The next business in order is the calling of States and Territories for resolutions, at which time bills on leave may be introduced, and all resolutions that give rise to debate shall lie over for one day.

AMNESTY.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to suspend the rules and proceed to consider the bill on the Speaker's table known as the amnesty bill.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not think there is any such bill on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand that the bill referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is properly on the Speaker's table.

Mr. RANDALL. The Speaker will remember that the bill was read at length but was not referred. But, to obviate any objection on that account, I move that the rules be suspended and that the House proceed to the consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill.

The bill, entitled "A bill to remove the disabilities imposed by the third section of the fourteenth article of the amendments of the Constitution of the United States" was read. It proposes (two-thirds of each House concurring) in its first section to remove all the disabilities imposed and remaining upon any person by virtue of the third section of the fourteenth article of the amendments of the Constitution of the United States and relieves therefrom forever each and every person.

It provides in its second section that whenever any person from whom disabilities are removed by this act shall be elected or appointed to any post or office of honor or trust under the Government of the United States, he shall take the oath prescribed by section 1757 of title 19 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, or such other official oath as may be hereafter prescribed in such cases by any future act of Congress.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] a question. I understood that the chairman of the Select Committee, of which I am a member, on the Centennial Celebration desires the House to go into Committee of the Whole on the bill reported by that committee.

Mr. RANDALL. My answer is that the gentleman has not made that motion; and if he did, I desire to say that my bill was prior in introduction, and that its consideration has only been interrupted by technicalities.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman from Pennsylvania does not mean that there is anything in the rules that compels the House to consider this in advance of the centennial bill?

Mr. RANDALL. I do not propose to discuss that point on a motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that the rules be suspended, that the House may proceed to the consideration of the amnesty bill.

The question being taken, the rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting in the affirmative.)

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to offer what I send to the desk as an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has the floor.

Mr. RANDALL. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. BLAINE. Does the gentleman desire to cut off amendments?

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to demand the previous question and to have it sustained, and I then propose to give to gentlemen on that side one-half of the time which may be allowed for discussion.

Mr. BLAINE. Does the gentleman propose not to admit any amendment?

Mr. RANDALL. I will listen, after the previous question is sustained, to an amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman knows well enough that sustaining the previous question cuts off amendments; cuts off everything.

Mr. RANDALL. I am quite aware of the effect of it. I have for twelve years learned its effect in adversity under the direction of yourself and that side of the House.

The question being taken on seconding the demand for the previous question,

The Speaker stated that in the judgment of the Chair the "ayes" had it.

Mr. BLAINE. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BLAINE and Mr. RANDALL were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 159, noes 95.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. RANDALL. I now have one hour for debate. I propose——

Mr. GARFIELD. Under what rule?

Mr. RANDALL. I propose to take it.

Mr. GARFIELD. Under what rule?

Mr. RANDALL. Because I have the floor.

Mr. GARFIELD. How does the gentleman hold the floor? This is not a report from a committee, and under the operation of the previous question there is no hour for debate.

Mr. RANDALL. I have the floor and under the rules I have one hour for discussion.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask again, under what rule?

Mr. BANKS. I desire the yeas and nays upon ordering the previous question; the House has voted under a misapprehension.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] will observe that the bill does not come from any committee, and therefore he has no right to an hour.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman has invoked the rigor of the rules, and he must abide by them. This bill does not come from any committee, and therefore, under the rules, he is not entitled to an hour for debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] that he thinks the call for the yeas and nays comes too late.

Mr. BANKS. No, sir. The House evidently voted under a misapprehension.

The SPEAKER. The last vote was only upon seconding the previous question.

Mr. BANKS. I am aware of that; but we have a right to the yeas and nays upon ordering the main question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman desires the yeas and nays on ordering the main question?

Mr. BANKS. I do, sir.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] is of course correct in stating that the yeas and nays can be had upon ordering the main question. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has raised a point of order which I would not have raised myself, but which, being raised, is entirely incontrovertible, that this bill, not coming from a committee, the previous question if sustained cuts off all debate. The rule allowing an hour for debate after the previous question is seconded applies only to reports from committees, and therefore this motion of the gentleman cuts off absolutely every moment of debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order raised by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. RANDALL. Allow me one minute. Does that side of the House object to debate?

Mr. BLAINE. This side of the House does not desire any unreasonable time, although, as Congress has been in session for five weeks and the House has held sessions about two days in a week, it might be considered reasonable that an hour or two should be allowed for debate upon a subject of this importance.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to know of the gentleman if anybody on that side of the House objects to debate?

Mr. GARFIELD. No. But we want consideration of the subject, which means debate and amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I propose to give every kind of consideration to the bill.

Mr. BLAINE. I told the gentleman in perfect good faith and perfect good feeling that it would be impossible to pass this bill without some discussion. The vote just taken reveals the fact that considerably more than one-third of the House object to the bill going through under the gag.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not propose to put it through under the gag. On the contrary, I propose to allow debate; but if any one objects to debate we must come to a direct vote. You yourselves have it within your province to have debate.

Mr. BLAINE. Of course the gentleman from Pennsylvania knows, as Mr. Benton left on record, that the very essence of the legislative power is the power to amend; and he confesses the weakness of his cause when he attempts to deprive the minority of the ordinary legislative right to offer amendments.

Mr. RANDALL. I am glad to see light at last dawning upon the gentleman, for during many years you were blind to any such consideration. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman will in vain search the Globe, for the twelve years that he and I have been members of the House, for any bill of this magnitude that was attempted to be put through without discussion or amendment. I defy him to cite an instance.

Mr. RANDALL. Was not this very bill passed last year by an introduction from the Committee on the Rules, of which you were a member?

Mr. BLAINE. And to which I objected.

Mr. RANDALL. Never; neither in the House nor in the committee did you object to this bill.

Mr. BLAINE. Being in the chair, and unable to interpose an objection myself, I endeavored to get several gentlemen to object. There is upon this floor a gentleman whom I asked to object to the bill. I asked the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAINEY] to stop it; but, with a delicacy which does honor to his position and his race, he said he would be misunderstood if he objected, although he thought the bill ought not to go through.

Mr. RANDADL. I say that this very bill, in almost these identical words, came from the committee of which you were a member without objection

Mr. BLAINE. I differ with the gentleman in point of fact; I did object to it. The gentleman does not sustain or maintain the parliamentary rules when he refers to anything that took place in the committee.

Mr. RANDALL. I say that neither in the committee nor in this House, in any way, as a member of this body or as its Presiding Officer, did you object. On the contrary, I say more, that at that time, so far as I was able to see or know, you facilitated the passage of this bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. GARFIELD. My point of order is that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] must address the Chair, and not the various members of the House as "you," or otherwise.

Mr. RANDALL. You are getting very fastidious.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have called the gentleman to order for the same reason several times in former sessions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BLAINE. I endeavored to object to the bill, but I was not able, being in the chair. Had I been upon the floor I should have done it.

The SPEAKER. The question before the House is, Shall the main question be now put? upon which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] asks for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire it to be distinctly understood that the parliamentary effect of ordering the main question at this time is to cut off all debate whatever.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to have it equally as well understood that such is not the purpose of this side of the House. If debate is cut off, it will be upon objection from the other side. This side of the House will divide the time that is allowed, or offered, or wasted, with the other side.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I would ask the gentleman if, under the rules, the minority can have the privilege of debate?

Mr. RANDALL. By unanimous consent they can; and the objection, mark you, must come from your side of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. How does the gentleman know that?

Mr. RANDALL. Because I speak advisedly; therefore I know.

The yeas and nays were then ordered.

The question was then taken upon ordering the main question; and there were—yeas 164, nays 100, not voting 27; as follows:

So the main question was ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. I now ask unanimous consent for one hour's debate prior to the taking of the vote on the final passage of the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I join with the gentleman, and add a request that by unanimous consent the bill may be considered open for amendment. I think there will be no objection to that.

Mr. RANDALL. I have not heard any one object to having debate upon the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire that the sense of the House may be taken on my suggestion.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask unanimous consent that one hour's debate be allowed on this bill before taking the vote on the final passage.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARFIELD. With the privilege of amendment. That is the way I understand the offer.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman does not understand any such thing.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I object, unless there is to be an opportunity for amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] objects.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I ask the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BLAINE. Will you allow me a single word?

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly—thirty minutes' "word."

Mr. BLAINE. The indications of the vote just taken are plainly that the bill in its present shape cannot pass without the liberty of some discussion and amendment. If it should fail to be passed I shall immediately move, with the recognition of the Speaker, that the rules be suspended and the gentleman's bill brought before the House for consideration. I shall then offer as a substitute the amendment which I have endeavored to submit; and the House can choose between the two propositions.

The only object on this side is to have a fair vote; there is no disposition whatever to block the question or to evade it, but merely to have an opportunity to make a record on it. The gentleman will see that he will evidently save time, and probably create better feeling and more harmony, by allowing the bill to take that course, because this side of the House has power to enforce that course.

Mr. RANDALL. One word. As the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] has asked an opportunity to speak, I may be allowed to say something. This bill is exactly the bill—word for word, with but a single addition of no importance—that a republican House passed without a call of the yeas and nays. Twice have republican Houses passed this bill, and twice has it been strangled in the Senate. I do not know what has come over the spirit of the republican party or what is the motive or purpose of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman will not allow me to state it. That is the very point.

Mr. RANDALL. I asked for one hour's debate, that the gentleman might have an opportunity to state it. I do not know what has come over the gentleman from Maine. I do not understand why he should want to change the bill in any particular from the bill as passed a year ago when he was Speaker and had in part the control of the majority of the House.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman says he does not see what has come over my spirit. I want an opportunity to state it, but he does not allow me.

Mr. RANDALL. I have asked unanimous consent that the other side of the House should have thirty minutes for debate. The gentleman can go on now if he chooses. Let him go on. I will not object.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not want to talk unless I talk to some purpose. I want to talk to an issue. I want to talk in favor of my amendment, and do not want to be confronted with a blank statement that that amendment cannot even have the poor privilege of being voted down. I suppose it will be voted down; but I want it at least to go upon the Journals of the House; and if permitted to speak, I want to speak on something.

Mr. RANDALL. The amendment is on the Journals of the House; that is just what I have permitted, that it should go upon the record of the House; so that the gentleman is thoroughly committed before the country.

Mr. BLAINE. O, no; it is not on the Journal of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. It is on the RECORD of the House.

Mr. BLAINE. But not on the Journal. The gentleman will please correct himself on that point.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman's object is already accomplished, if he wants to go before the country as an obstructionist to amnesty.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman is obstructing amnesty; he is withholding it from every man in the South now under disabilities, because he will not even allow a vote on the proposition to except Jefferson Davis.

Mr. RANDALL. Did you allow the minority of this House to offer amendments to the civil-rights bill?

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. HALE demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 175, nays 97, not voting 18; as follows:

YEAS,—Messrs. Ainsworth, Anderson, Ashe, Atkins, Bagby, John H. Bagley, jr., Banks, Barnum, Beebe, Bell, Blackburn, Bland, Blount, Boone, Bradford, Bright, John Young Brown, Buckner, Samuel D. So (two-thirds not having voted in the affirmative) the bill was not passed.

During the vote,

Mr. PURMAN said: For the purpose of enabling the gentleman from Maine to offer his amendment I will change my vote to "no."

Mr. RANDALL. Debate is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can change his vote, but debate is not in order.

Mr. PURMAN. I change my vote from "ay" to "no."

Mr. WHITE. I change my vote to "no."

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. Two-thirds not having voted in favor of the bill, it is rejected.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the vote which has just been declared. I propose to debate that motion, and now give notice that if the motion to reconsider is agreed to it is my intention to offer the amendment which has been read several times. I will not delay the House to have it read again.

Every time the question of amnesty has been brought before the House by a gentleman on that side for the last two Congresses, it has been done with a certain flourish of magnanimity which is an imputation on this side of the House, as though the republican party which has been in charge of the Government for the last twelve or fourteen years had been bigoted, narrow, and illiberal, and as though certain very worthy and deserving gentlemen in the Southern States were ground down to-day under a great tyranny and oppression, from which the hard-heartedness of this side of the House cannot possibly be prevailed upon to relieve them.

If I may anticipate as much wisdom as ought to characterize that side of the House, this may be the last time that amnesty will be discussed in the American Congress. I therefore desire, and under the rules of the House, with no thanks to that side for the privilege, to place on record just what the republican party has done in this matter. I wish to place it there as an imperishable record of liberality, and large-mindedness, and magnanimity, and mercy far beyond any that has ever been shown before in the world's history by conqueror to conquered.

With the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] I entered this Congress in the midst of the hot flame of war, when the Union was rocking to its foundations, and no man knew whether we were to have a country or not. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania would have been surprised when he and I were novices in the Thirty-eighth Congress, if he could have foreseen, before our joint service ended, we should have seen sixty-one gentlemen, then in arms against us, admitted to equal privileges with ourselves, and all by the grace and magnanimity of the republican party. When the war ended, according to the universal usage of nations, the Government, then under the exclusive control of the republican party, had the right to determine what should be the political status of the people who had been defeated in war. Did we inaugurate any measures of persecution? Did we set forth on a career of bloodshed and vengeance? Did we take property? Did we prohibit any man all his civil rights? Did we take from him the right he enjoys to-day, to vote?

Not at all. But instead of a general and sweeping condemnation the republican party placed in the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution only this exclusion; after considering the whole subject, it ended in simply coming down to this:

That no person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice-President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may, by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability.

It has been variously estimated that this section at the time of its original insertion in the Constitution included somewhere from fourteen to thirty thousand persons; as nearly as I can gather together the facts of the case, it included about eighteen thousand men in the South. It let go every man of the hundreds of thousands—or millions if you please—who had been engaged in the attempt to destroy this Government, and only held those under disability, who in addition to revolting, had violated a special and peculiar and personal oath to support the Constitution of the United States. It was limited to that.

Well, that disability was hardly placed upon the South until we began in this Hall and in the other wing of the Capitol, when there were more than two-thirds republicans in both branches, to remit it, and the very first bill took that disability off from 1,578 citizens of the South; and the next bill took it off from 3,526 gentlemen—by wholesale. Many of the gentlemen on this floor came in for grace and amnesty in those two bills. After these bills specifying individuals had passed, and others, of smaller numbers, which I will not recount, the Congress of the United States in 1872, by two-thirds of both branches, still being two-thirds republican, passed this general law:

That all political disabilities imposed by the third section of the fourteenth article of amendments of the Constitution of the United States are hereby removed from all persons whomsoever, except Senators and Representatives of the Thirty-sixth and Thirty-seventh Congresses, officers in the judicial, military, and naval service of the United States, heads of Departments, and foreign ministers of the United States.

Since that act passed a very considerable number of the gentlemen which it still left under disability have been relieved specially, by name, in separate acts. But I believe, Mr. Speaker, in no single instance since the act of May 22, 1872, have the disabilities been taken from any man except upon his respectful petition to the Congress of the United States that they should be removed. And I believe in no instance, except one, have they been refused upon the petition being presented. I believe in no instance, except one, has there been any other than a unanimous vote.

Now, I find there are widely varying opinions in regard to the number that are still under disabilities in the South. I have had occasion, by conference with the Department of War and of the Navy, and with the assistance of some records which I have caused to be searched, to be able to state to the House, I believe with more accuracy than it has been stated hitherto, just the number of gentlemen in the South still under disabilities. Those who were officers of the United States Army, educated at its own expense at West Point and who joined the rebellion, and are still included under this act, number, as nearly as the War Department can figure it up, 325; those in the Navy about 295. Those under the other heads, Senators and Representatives of the Thirty-sixth and Thirty-seventh Congresses, officers in the judicial service of the United States, heads of Departments, and foreign ministers of the United States, make up a number somewhat more difficult to state accurately, but smaller in the aggregate. The whole sum of the entire list is about—it is probably impossible to state it with entire accuracy, and I do not attempt to do that—is about 750 persons now under disabilities.

I am very frank to say that in regard to all these gentlemen, save one, I do not know of any reason why amnesty should not be granted to them as it has been to many others of the same class. I am not here to argue against it. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] suggests "on their application." I am coming to that. But as I have said, seeing in this list, as I have examined it with some care, no gentleman to whom I think there would be any objection, since amnesty has already become so general—and I am not going back of that question to argue it—I am in favor of granting it to them. But in the absence of this respectful form of application, which since May 22, 1872, has become a sort of common law, as preliminary to amnesty, I simply wish to put in that they shall go before a United States court, and in open court, with uplifted hand, swear that they mean to conduct themselves as good citizens of the United States. That is all.

Now, gentlemen may say that this is a foolish exaction. Possibly it is. But somehow or other I have a prejudice in favor of it. And there are some petty points in it that appeal as well to prejudice as to conviction. For one I do not want to impose citizenship on any gentleman. If I am correctly informed, and I state it only on rumor, there are some gentlemen in this list who have spoken contemptuously of the idea of their taking citizenship, and have spoken still more contemptuously of the idea of their applying for citizenship. I may state it wrongly, and if I do I am willing to be corrected, but I understand that Mr. Robert Toombs has, on several occasions, at watering-places both in this country and in Europe, stated that he would not ask the United States for citizenship. Very well; we can stand it about as well as Mr. Robert Toombs can. And if Mr. Robert Toombs is not prepared to go into a court of the United States and swear that he means to be a good citizen, let him stay out. I do not think that the two Houses of Congress should convert themselves into a joint convention for the purpose of embracing Mr. Robert Toombs and gushingly request him to favor us by coming back to accept of all the honors of citizenship. That is the whole. All I ask is that each of these gentlemen shall show his good faith by coming forward and taking the oath which you on that side of the House and we on this side of the House and all of us take, and gladly take. It is a very small exaction to make as a preliminary to full restoration to all the rights of citizenship.

In my amendment, Mr. Speaker, I have excepted Jefferson Davis from its operation. Now I do not place it on the ground that Mr. Davis was, as he has been commonly called, the head and front of the rebellion, because on that ground I do not think the exception would be tenable. Mr. Davis was just as guilty, no more so, no less so, than thousands of others who have already received the benefit and grace of amnesty. Probably he was far less efficient as an enemy of the United States; probably he was far more useful as a disturber of the councils of the confederacy than many who have already received amnesty. It is not because of any particular and special damage that he above others did to the Union, or because he was personally or especially of consequence, that I except him. But I except him on this ground: that he was the author, knowingly, deliberately, guiltily, and willfully, of the gigantic murders and crimes at Andersonville.

A MEMBER. And Libby.

Mr. BLAINE. Libby pales into insignificance before Andersonville. I place it on that ground, and I believe to-day that so rapidly does one event follow on the heels of another in the rapid age in which we live, that even those of us who were contemporaneous with what was transpiring there, and still less those who have grown up since, fail to remember the gigantic crime then committed.

Sir, since the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] introduced this bill, last month, I have taken occasion to reread some of the historic cruelties of the world. I have read over the details of those atrocious murders of the Duke of Alva in the Low Countries which are always mentioned with a thrill of horror throughout Christendom. I have read the details of the massacre of Saint Bartholomew, that stand out in history as one of those atrocities beyond imagination. I have read anew the horrors untold and unimaginable of the Spanish Inquisition. And I here, before God, measuring my words, knowing their full extent and import, declare that neither the deeds of the Duke of Alva in the Low Countries, nor the massacre of Saint Bartholomew, nor the thumb-screws and engines of torture of the Spanish Inquisition begin to compare in atrocity with the hideous crime of Andersonville. [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. That is an infamous slander.

The SPEAKER. If such demonstrations are repeated in the galleries the Chair will order them to be cleared.

Mr. BLAINE. Thank God, Mr. Speaker, that while this Congress was under different control from that which exists here to-day, with a committee composed of both sides and of both branches, that tale of horror was placed where it cannot be denied or gainsaid.

I hold in my hand the story written out by a committee of Congress. I state that Winder, who is dead, was sent to Andersonville with a full knowledge of his previous atrocities; that those atrocities in Richmond were so fearful, so terrible, that confederate papers, the Richmond Examiner for one, stated when he was gone that, "Thank God, Richmond is rid of his presence." We in the North knew from returning skeletons what he had accomplished at Belle Isle and Libby. And fresh from those accomplishments he was sent by Mr. Davis, against the protests of others in the confederacy, to construct this den of horrors at Andersonville.

Now, of course it would be utterly beyond the scope of the occasion and beyond the limits of my hour for me to go into details. But in arraigning Mr. Davis I undertake here to say that I will not ask any gentleman to take the testimony of a single Union soldier. I ask them to take only the testimony of men who themselves were engaged and enlisted in the confederate cause. And if that testimony does not entirely carry out and justify the declaration I have made, then I will state that I have been entirely in error in my reading.

After detailing the preparation of that prison, the arrangements made with hideous cruelty for the victims, the report which I hold in my hand, and which was concurred in by democratic members as well as republican members of Congress, states this—and I beg members to hear it, for it is far more impressive than anything I can say. After, I say, giving full details, the report states:

The subsequent history of Andersonville has startled and shocked the world with a tale of horror, of woe, and death, before unheard and unknown to civilization. No pen can describe, no painter sketch, no imagination comprehend its fearful and unutterable iniquity. It would seem as if the concentrated madness of earth and hell had found its final lodgment in the breasts of those who inaugurated the rebellion and controlled the policy of the confederate government, and that the prison at Andersonville had been selected for the most terrible human sacrifice which the world had ever seen. Into its narrow walls were crowded thirty-five thousand enlisted men, many of them the bravest and best, the most devoted and heroic of those grand armies which carried the flag of their country to final victory. For long and weary months here they suffered, maddened, were murdered, and died. Here they lingered, unsheltered from the burning rays of a tropical sun by day and drenching and deadly dews by night, in every stage of mental and physical disease, hungered, emaciated, starving, maddened; festering with unhealed wounds; gnawed by the ravages of scurvy and gangrene; with swollen limb and distorted visage; covered with vermin which they had no power to extirpate; exposed to the flooding rains which drove them drowning from the miserable holes in which, like swine, they burrowed; parched with thirst and mad with hunger; racked with pain or prostrated with the weakness of dissolution; with naked limbs and matted hair; filthy with smoke and mud; soiled with the very excrement from which their weakness would not permit them to escape; eaten by the gnawing worms which their own wounds had engendered; with no bed but the earth; no covering save the cloud or the sky; these men, these heroes, born in the image of God, thus crouching and writhing in their terrible torture and calculating barbarity, stand forth in history as a monument of the surpassing horrors of Andersonville as it shall be seen and read in all future time, realizing in the studied torments of their prison-house the ideal of Dante's Inferno and Milton's hell.

I undertake to say, from reading the testimony, that that is a moderate description. I will read but a single paragraph from the testimony of Rev. William John Hamilton, a man I believe who never was in the North, a Catholic priest at Macon. He is a southern man and a democrat and a catholic priest. And when you unite those three qualities in one man you will not find much testimony that would be strained in favor of the republican party. [Laughter.]

This man had gone to Andersonville on a mission of mercy to the men of his own faith, to administer to them the rites of his church in their last moments. That is why he happened to be a witness. I will read his answer under oath to a question addressed to him in regard to the bodily condition of the prisoners. He said:

Well, as I said before, when I went there I was kept so busily engaged in giving the sacrament to the dying men that I could not observe much; but of course I could not keep my eyes closed as to what I saw there. I saw a great many men perfectly naked—walking about the stockade perfectly nude; they seemed to have lost all regard for delicacy, shame, morality, or anything else. I would frequently have to creep on my hands and knees into the holes that the men had burrowed in the ground, and stretch myself out alongside of them to hear their confessions. I found them almost living in vermin in those holes; they could not be in any other condition but a filthy one, because they got no soap and no change of clothing, and were there all huddled up together.

Their clothes had been taken from them, as other testimony shows—

Let me read further from the same witness another specimen:

The first person I conversed with on entering the stockade was a countryman of mine, a member of the Catholic church, who recognized me as a clergyman. I think his name was Farrell. He was from the north of Ireland. He came toward me and introduced himself. He was quite a boy; I do not think, judging from his appearance, that he could have been more than sixteen years old. I found him without a hat and without any covering on his feet, and without jacket or coat. He told me that his shoes had been taken from him on the battle-field. I found the boy suffering very much from a wound on his right foot; in fact the foot was split open like an oyster; and on inquiring the cause they told me it was from exposure to the sun in the stockade, and not from any wound received in battle. I took off my boots and gave him a pair of socks to cover his feet and told him I would bring him some clothing, as I expected to return to Andersonville the following week. I had to return to Macon to get another priest to take my place on Sunday. When I returned on the following week, on inquiring for this man Farrell, his companions told me he had stepped across the dead-line and requested the guards to shoot him. He was not insane at the time I was conversing with him.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to go into such horrible details as these for any purpose of rousing bad feeling. I wish only to say that the man who administered the affairs of that prison went there by order of Mr. Davis, was sustained by him; and this William John Hamilton, from whose testimony I have read, states here that he went to General Howell Cobb, commanding that department, and asked that intelligence as to the condition of affairs there be transmitted to the confederate government at Richmond. For the matter of that, there are a great many proofs to show that Mr. Davis was thoroughly informed as to the condition of affairs at Andersonville.

One word more and I shall lay aside this book. When the march of General Sherman, or some other invasion of that portion of the country, was under way, there was danger or supposed danger that it might come into the neighborhood of Andersonville; and the following order, to which I invite the attention of the House—a regular military order—Order No. 13, dated headquarters Confederate States military prison, Andersonville, July 27, 1864, was issued by Brigadier-General John H. Winder:

The officers on duty and in charge of the battery of Florida artillery at the time will, upon receiving notice that the enemy have approached within seven miles of this post, open fire upon the stockade with grape-shot without reference to the situation beyond these lines of defense.

Now, here were these 35,000 poor, helpless, naked, starving, sickened, dying men. This Catholic priest states that he begged Mr. Cobb to represent that if they could not exchange those men, or could not relieve them in any other way, they should be taken to the Union lines in Florida and paroled; for they were shadows, they were skeletons. Yet it was declared by a regular order of Mr. Davis's officer that if the Union forces should come within seven miles the battery of Florida artillery should open fire with grape-shot on these poor, helpless men, without the slightest possible regard to what was going on outside.

Now, I do not arraign the southern people for this. God forbid that I should charge any people with sympathizing with such things. There were many evidences of great uneasiness among the southern people about it; and one of the great crimes of Jefferson Davis was that, besides conniving at and producing that condition of things, he concealed it from the southern people. He labored not only to conceal it, but to make false statements about it. We have obtained, and have now in the Congressional Library, a complete series of Mr. Davis's messages—the official imprint from Richmond. I have looked over them, and I have here an extract from his message of November 7, 1864, at the very time that these horrors were at there acme. Mark you, when those horrors of which I have read specimens were at their extremest verge of desperation, Mr. Davis sends a message to the confederate congress at Richmond, in which he says:

The solicitude of the Government for the relief of our captive fellow-citizens has known no abatement, but has on the contrary been still more deeply evoked by the additional sufferings to which they have been wantonly subjected by deprivation of adequate food, clothing, and fuel; which they were not even permitted to purchase from the prison sutler.

And he adds that the—Enemy attempted to excuse their barbarous treatment by the unfounded allegation that it was retaliatory for like conduct on our part.

Now I undertake here to say that there is not a confederate soldier now living, who has any credit as a man in his community and who ever was a prisoner in the hands of the Union forces, who will say that he ever was cruelly treated; that he ever was deprived of the same rations that the Union soldiers had—the same food and the same clothing.

Mr. COOK. Thousands of them say it—thousands of them; men of as high character as any in this House.

Mr. BLAINE. I take issue upon that. There is not one who can substantiate it—not one. As for measures of retaliation, although goaded by this terrific treatment of our friends imprisoned by Mr. Davis, the Senate of the United States specifically refused to pass a resolution of retaliation, as contrary to modern civilization and the first precepts of Christianity. And there was no retaliation attempted or justified. It was refused; and Mr. Davis knew it was refused just as well as I knew it or any other man, because what took place in Washington or what took place in Richmond was known on either side of the line within a day or two thereafter.

Mr. Speaker, this is not a proposition to punish Jefferson Davis. There is nobody attempting that. I will very frankly say I myself thought the indictment of Mr. Davis at Richmond, under the administration of Mr. Johnson, was a weak attempt, for he was indicted only for that of which he was guilty in common with all others who went into the confederate movement. Therefore, there was no particular reason for it. But I will undertake to say this, and, as it may be considered an extreme speech, I want to say it with great deliberation, that there is not a government, a civilized government on the face of the globe—I am very sure there is not a European government—that would not have arrested Mr. Davis, and when they had him in their power would not have tried him for maltreatment of the prisoners of war and shot him within thirty days. France, Russia, England, Germany, Austria, any one of them would have done it. The poor victim Wirz deserved his death for brutal treatment, and murder of many victims, but I always thought it was a weak movement on the part of our Government to allow Jefferson Davis to go at large and hang Wirz. I confess I do. Wirz was nothing in the world but a mere subordinate, a tool, and there was no special reason for singling him out for death. I do not say he did not deserve it—he did richly, amply, fully. He deserved no mercy, but at the same time, as I have often said, it seemed like skipping over the president, superintendent, and board of directors in the case of a great railroad accident and hanging the brakeman of the rear car. [Laughter.]

There is no proposition here to punish Jefferson Davis. Nobody is seeking to do it. That time has gone by. The statute of limitations, common feelings of humanity, will supervene for his benefit. But what you ask us to do is to declare by a vote of two-thirds of both branches of Congress that we consider Mr. Davis worthy to fill the highest offices in the United States if he can get a constituency to indorse him. He is a voter; he can buy and he can sell; he can go and he can come. He is as free as any man in the United States. There is a large list of subordinate offices to which he is eligible. This bill proposes, in view of that record, that Mr. Davis, by a two-thirds vote of the Senate and a two-thirds vote of the House, be declared eligible and worthy to fill any office up to the Presidency of the United States. For one, upon full deliberation, I will not do it.

One word more, Mr. Speaker, in the way of detail, which I omitted. It has often been said in mitigation of Jefferson Davis in the Andersonville matter that the men who died there in such large numbers (I think the victims were about fifteen thousand) fell prey to an epidemic, and died of a disease which could not be averted. The record shows that out of 35,000 men about 33 per cent died, that is, one in three, while of the soldiers encamped near by to take care and guard them only one man in four hundred died; that is, within half a mile only one in four hundred died.

As to the general question of amnesty, Mr. Speaker, as I have already said, it is too late to debate it. It has gone by. Whether it has in all respects been wise, or whether it has been unwise, I would not detain the House here to discuss. Even if I had a strong conviction upon that question, I do not know that it would be productive of any great good to enunciate it; but, at the same time, it is a very singular spectacle that the republican party, in possession of the entire Government, have deliberately called back into public power the leading men of the South, every one of whom turns up its bitter and relentless and malignant foe; and to-day, from the Potomac to the Rio Grande, the very men who have received this amnesty are as busy as they can be in consolidating into one compact political organization the old slave States, just as they were before the war. We see the banner held out blazoned again with the inscription that, with the united South and a very few votes from the North, this country can be governed. I want the people to understand that is precisely the movement; that that is the animus and the intent. I do not think offering amnesty to the seven hundred and fifty men who are now without it will hasten or retard that movement. I do not think the granting of amnesty to Mr. Davis will hasten or retard it, or that refusing it will do either.

I hear it said, "We will lift Mr. Davis again into great consequence by refusing amnesty." That is not for me to consider; I only see before me, when his name is presented, a man who by a wink of his eye, by a wave of his hand, by a nod of his head, could have stopped the atrocity at Andersonville. Some of us had kinsmen there, most of us had friends there, all of us had countrymen there, and in the name of those kinsmen, friends, and countrymen I here protest, and shall with my vote protest, against their calling back and crowning with the honors of full American citizenship the man who organized that murder.

Mr. COX obtained the floor.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to state that if this motion to reconsider shall prevail, I shall then offer my substitute for the bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, the honorable gentleman from Maine, who under some dispensation of Providence or of the people is no longer our Speaker, has seen proper at the beginning of this centennial year to tear away the plasters of prudence over the green and bloody wounds of our civil conflict. He has seen proper to justify his conduct in the light of history. I venture to say that there is no precedent in history and no canon in political philosophy which the party in the minority on this floor have not outraged.

The annals of American amnesty furnish a record of republican wrong. Our civil conflict came out of sectional animosity. Our mutual grievances might have been assuaged by the spirit of conciliation. That spirit was wanting, and the red storm was upon us. During those long and bloody years the radical party sought with tigerish appetite not for peace and union so much as for revenge and conquest. It even sought by unconstitutional confiscation to despoil the innocent children of the South of their inheritance for the deeds of their sires. At that time I was compelled to appeal to a higher law for the vindication of constitutional humanity. In January, 1864, to answer the proscriptive nature of the radical argument, I said:

> Truly, sir, we have fallen on evil times, when, to bolster up a bill of penalty like this, upon the children of the guilty, the beautiful and sacred relations of the family are to be disrupted. I am shocked, that in this age, and in this country, and in this House—and after England, following our example, has reformed her old and barbarous law forfeiting estates in fee—I am required to stand up before the American people, and, as a matter of pure philanthrophy and common decency, portest against the cruel and remorseless character of bills of this kind, and to defend the rights of those who have committed no crime, but upon whom it is proposed to visit, after the death of the parent, the crimes of the ancestor. I protest against such bills as contrary to the gentle and loving spirit of the Savior, who, while upon His trancendent mission to this attainted and corrupted world, shielded in His arms the little ones of Judea. His words have a tender and sweet significance which it would not be unbecoming us as Christian legislators to heed: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these, ye have done it unto Me." Would that these words were graven upon our memories and hearts when we come to vote upon this harsh and vengeful measure against the little children of the South! Such words interpret the Constitution by a liberal canon of kindness—more potent than ever Grotius, Vattel, or Story conceived or expressed, or than ever modern philanthropy practiced!

Instead of lenity, radicalism broke codes and established tyranny. Instead of building the Roman bridge of gold for the returning recusant, it made the rickety bridge of reconstruction.

Ten years after the termination of the war it proposed the bad rule of force and the bravado of brigadiers to coerce States and upturn established institutions. During the long period since the war it has often babbled of concord. It has made festive speeches about centennial and fraternal feeling, only to return to the low instincts of party advantage and discordant legislation.

At last the people of all sections by an immense majority rose against these policies. They would no longer worship the Nemesis of republicanism; they had read the promise that "good tidings should bind up the broken-hearted, and to them that mourn there should be given beauty for ashes." They felt as they hoped, that the old wastes should be rebuilded and the former desolations be raised up; and they cast up a highway and lifted up a standard for the people! They have sent us here to restore and bless with a grace that knows no grudging, and with a general and generous law that makes no invidious exception, and which will leave no bitterness in its execution.

How have we been met by the other side? By insectiverous attempts to foster fresh hate, about a few Union soldiers here, and that, too, without a foundation of truth or a spark of human generosity toward their sixty peers from the South, who sit courteously and quietly in our midst, intent on the same sentiment of patriotic devotion.

When, therefore, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] proposes again the bill which was passed by this branch in the last Congress and defeated by the Senate, we may well understand how it is met by the same spirit of reluctance. Priding itself on some superior virtue and patriotism, it cannot allow the mercy of amnesty to go through without party spite. It forgives, but hopes in some way still to punish by fixing a brand on the leader of the revolt. It forgets the grand spirit of Sir Thomas Browne. That spirit teaches that partial forgiveness was not oblivion; that the curtain of night should be shut upon injuries; that they should be as if they had not been, and that reserved forgiveness is not to forgive at all.

Let this sentiment be set in gold for all nations, races, and ages:

> Let not the sun in Capricorn go down on our wrath. Let us write our wrongs in ashes; draw the curtain of night upon injuries; shut them up in the tower of oblivion, and let them be as though they had not been. To forgive and yet hope that God will punish our enemies is not to forgive enough. To forgive and not pray God to forgive, is a partial piece of charity. Forgive thine enemies totally, and without any reserve.

The wisest men have advised not to answer in wrath nor on the spur of fury; not to be prodigal in revenges. The old adage of an eye for an eye is not the maxim of generous natures. It is the soft tongue, the heaping of coals of fire on the enemy's head, and the charm of conquest by kindness that makes retaliation grateful and leaves no hatred after it. The sagacious thinkers among men, who have redeemed incivism and made order out of chaos, teach that our wrongs should not be written on marble, but in water.

It is reserved for the gentleman to impress upon his party the inglorious and unreasoning policies of hate. To him the "dead enemy smells well," and he finds musk and amber in revenge. His amendment, couched in the spirit of partial amnesty, is designed to re-inspire wrath and capture the ear of his willing partisans. He would rake over the dead embers of hate to relight the fires of persecution and punishment.

The gentleman has referred to the Duke of Alva. He is no doubt familiar, and his party since the war, at least, have been familiar with that history. The history of the Netherlands under the Duke of Alva is the history of the radicalism, spoliation, murder, death, and tyranny in the South since 1865. The gentleman says there is no precedent in history for general amnesty. There is a precedent two thousand years ago, and all history is filled with precedents to the point that nations should not make monuments to vengeance; that nations should not build monuments except to foreign conquest—never monuments to domestic calamity. This was the advice of Tiberius to the Roman senate when that body begged Tiberius to erect a monument to vengeance, to commemorate the death of one who fell in civil strife. It has been reserved to the gentleman from Maine to fly in the face of all history, pagan history, Hebraic history, Christian history, and Christian doctrine. Now, in this year of grace and jubilee, he issues his anathema maran-atha against the South. What is his peculiar purpose?

It is not for one member to challenge the motives of another on this floor. Whatever may be the intention of the gentleman, whether led like Macbeth by the dangerous vision of the crown or the hope of reviving the life and vigor of his party; whether this, like other political devices, is meant to divert the public scrutiny from maladministration and whelm in sectional emotion the better feelings of our people, which has sent this majority here; whether he fears that the approaching era of national revolutionary memories may run counter to the narrow ostracism of his limited politics, it is sure that the gentleman has himself not only received new light upon this subject, but that this light leads astray, and is not the light of heaven.

I take issue with the honorable gentleman from Maine when he says that his party is clement and amnestical. It is not true. It was not true during the war. It has not been true since. It is not true to-day. And whenever his party has tried to seem clement, it has been sure to spoil the clemency by a small, partisan policy.

The history of amnesty is not long; nor is it a fresh theme of mine. My first pleading for it was during the war. Out of its spirit sprang the joint resolution which I offered and which was passed for the exchange of prisoners. It was a partial truce, to soften the horrors of war.

How did the party of the gentleman even then act upon this peculiar question? Is the administration record all right as to the exchange of prisoners during the war? I say on the authority of sixty and odd gentlemen here, many of them having been in the service of the confederacy during the war, that no order was issued at any time in the South relative to prisoners who were taken by the South as to rations or clothing that did not apply equally to their own soldiers; and any ex parte statements taken by that humbug committee from which the gentleman has quoted, all that can be raked and scraped together in the shape of these miserable ex parte affidavits, cannot controvert the facts of history which will be determined on a fair issue made. So far as the southern government was concerned, whatever may have been the bad conduct of certain persons under them, their orders at least were couched in the spirit of fairness and humanity.

But the gentleman from Maine goes further. He defends the action of the republican party during and since the war because it was so magnanimous, so grand. Why, it allowed you gentlemen of the South to come back here to the American Congress! God bless us all! [Laughter.] The republican party, by the grace of the gentleman from Maine and others, elected you men of the South by removing your disabilities. Down on your knees, gentlemen of the South, before his majesty of Maine! [Laughter.]

In the spirit of generosity, and with a view to the restoration of peace and union, I have pleaded here for the laws of natural justice: I pleaded for it on sea, to stop predatory and barbarous practices, to enable combatants to make peace, unimbittered by cruelties to helpless women and children, to non-combatants, and to men of productive industry and peaceful occupations in private life; in fine, to make laws for war, and to make them respected and not silent amid the very clangor of conflict. I protested against illegal seizures of property and person, and against punishing and desolating the regions invaded. The very number of the delinquents who fail in patriotism has been held by Vattel and other publicists as the incentive to clemency. Where there are two distinct societies or bodies, and where rebellion rises into civil war, and the insurgency is suppressed, the duty toward the conquered is that of the conquering nation toward its equal in national independence and autonomy. For a stronger reason, those who are engaged in lacerating their common country, the laws of war and the maxims of moderation and humanity obtain. Is it fair to pillage the home of the widow and the heritage of the orphan? Is it just to fire the hospital and the library?

Is it human to hang prisoners or poison wells? Then and in such cases, to suppress rebellion, you only intensify and re-invigorate, and you close the door to conciliation.

Any movement looking to the consorting affections of the people, and which decks the sword with the olive, is of the highest statesmanship. Is it not patriotism also? Does it not bring forth the idea or sentiment of oneness in a nation? Does it not blaze out a path in the wilderness of battle to the roof-tree of home? When, therefore, it was sought, in the fell spirit of this amendment, to inspire more hate, by the confiscation of the estates of the innocent, was I not right in interpreting our Constitution by the canons of kindness? And by a parity of reasoning, when it is sought again and now to perpetuate hate by the continued proscription of the chief of the insurgency, may I not again appeal to the spirit of Him who, when He spake to little children and bade them come to Him, also stood upon the nameless mountain and gave us the great lessons of forgiveness to one another, even to the love of our enemies and persecutors.

When the war was drawing to its close, and States were rescued and reconstruction with the military was proposed by one-tenth of the population of such States by legislation here, it became my duty again to warn against that mistake so often fatal to governments, which confounds the pervading taint of disaffection with mere local isolation. At that time President Lincoln had begun to show that magnanimity which aided our conquering armies. He proposed amnesty. It was the first adventure beyond the line of force into the field of conciliation.

When the amnesty of Mr. Lincoln was proposed—proposed in a spirit O, how different from that exhibited by the gentleman from Maine!—he said that he was actuated by malice toward none and charity toward all, Jefferson Davis included. There was no exception, no restriction, no odious test-oaths, which are the odium of history and the derision of all governments—such oaths as we have had—the ironclad and others. Why, sir, the gentleman from Maine could not have been raised in a Christian church, or in any church which teaches the gospel of Him that "spake as never man spake." I cannot tell—the nation does not know, in what church he was raised, [laughter;] but one thing I do know, that if he had read the spirit of the Sermon on the Mount aright, he never would have made the vindictive speech which came from him to-day. "Forgive your enemies. Bless those who persecute you." [Ironical laughter on the republican side.]

The bugles of President Lincoln sounded a truce, though ever so remotely and faintly, but its echoes were as undying as his motto for charity and against malice. He had endeavored to reform the Union, but his fatal error was that his republicanism was based upon the small apex of his political pyramid. It was held that the States were destroyed; only a tabula rasa remained to write the future codes of the many by the sword. The equal dignity of the States was destroyed, and no persuasive measures followed on which to construct anew. The cry was that the "penitentiary of hell" was the prison for the recusants. What followed we know. Cessation of hostilities after the surrender to Sherman on honorable terms; the old ties renewed; a common feeling of fellowship in the Union on the part of the South. What on the part of the North? Moral treason and social anarchy; political proscription and adventurous rapacity; a licentious, uncivic soldiery, and revengeful appetite for pillage? The enchantments of the old associations, almost renewed, were torn to pieces. Poison, not oil, was poured into the unhealed wounds of war. It was the Saturnian revel, in which the father devoured his own offspring. Contentment fled before ignorance and spoliation. Anarchy, secret societies, undisciplined ravage, and reprisals of fraud were followed by rancor and unrest. The friends of the radicals talked extermination, and the better angels of our nature fled aghast from the spectacle.

When a great scholar wrote to the conquering Charlemagne how to treat the subjugated Huns, what was his advice? First. Send gentlemannered men among them. Second. Do not require the tithe. Better lose the tithe than prejudice the people. "Mortal! Treat mortals with kindness. One sacred streams flows for us all." But when the Congress sent its decrees South and the emissaries of discord to execute them, it was a question which was the worst curse, the agents of the Government or the fraudulent taxes! No forgiveness to the enemy; no hope to the desponding; no protection to the oppressed; no measures of moderation. We neither fortified our strength with liberality nor gave courage to despair. Discontent grew, and with it provocations to revolt. But the South remained patient, forbearing, waiting, like the soul of the Psalmist, "more than they that watch for the morning." Did that morning dawn! Ah! how slowly to the weary watcher.

Then came juggling pretenses of amnesty; now and then, for treachery and party service, individual disabilities were removed; now and then some generous impulse would cross the popular mind, led by the better men of the Republican party, only to be suppressed by the iron hand of revenge. When Mr. Sumner proposed to erase the names of victories from the battle-flags, Massachusetts drew black lines around his honored name. When Horace Greeley proposed to reconcile all by amnesty, and even proposed to bail Jefferson Davis and enlarge him from Fortress Monroe, he was hunted as the tiger hunts the lamb. When Chase, and Trumbull, and men of their large mold proposed honorable and responsible governments for the South and peace through all our borders the counter-cry went up, even from this Hall, for funerals, outlawries, and all other schemes of vulgar despotism. When States were smitten, as Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Louisiana; when usurpation went hand in hand with the greedy minions of fraud and the supple tools of force, the cry grew louder for an unrelenting subjugation!

During this decade of wrong, outraging every lesson of history and every tenet of political philosophy, every code of humane law and every attribute of divine mercy, most of the leading men of the stricken South remained disabled. If they received their ability, it was with niggard acquiescence, without an element of graciousness.

I will proceed to give you the amnesty which was proposed. Perhaps there will not be so many thorns crackling under the pot, which is called the laughter of a certain class, [laughter,] and which I have just heard from the other side of the House. Many particular and partial amnesties were engineered and carried through the House by these republican gentlemen. What for? In a spirit of gracious Christian kindness? No. They were the rewards which you paid for partisan services and base treachery to recruit your failing ranks.

Mr. BLAINE. How did the gentlemen on the other side of the House get here?

Mr. COX. I will tell you that directly.

Mr. BLAINE. Did they betray their cause?

Mr. COX. I will come to that directly. They came here because the South wanted honest representatives, and your representatives from the South were not honest. [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

Mr. BLAINE. Will the gentleman tell us how they got amnesty?

Mr. COX. They got amnesty by force of a popular sentiment which enabled a few good men on your side to join the good men on this side and compel amnesty. I will show you where that comes in directly. [Renewed applause.]

Scarcely a general scheme for amnesty was entertained by the party in power until 1869. Many particular cases were passed for special partisan reasons. But in 1869–'70 I offered a resolution for general and unexceptional amnesty. Every effort was made to conceal the record on that subject. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] at last, to get an open vote, moved to lay it on the table, voting against his own motion. The motion was lost—yeas 84, nays 87. Some twenty republicans joined the democrats in this liberal vote, and along with them many colored members, for on that day the colored troops fought nobly. [Laughter.] This is a pretty commentary on the white side of that part of the House. [Laughter.] But the body of your party at once referred it to the sepulcher called a committee on reconstruction, with only 56 negative votes, where it slept the sleep that knows no waking. [Laughter.]

Then an emergency arose, and at the last session of the Forty-first Congress, on December 15, 1870, General Butler's bill was introduced. A curious bill it was. I think the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] must have modeled his bill a little on that, for Butler's bill was modeled on a bill of the English Parliament against the Pretender's friends in Scotland. In that long bill of General Butler there was one conspicuous exception, the Rob Roy McGregor. And the gentleman from Maine has picked out his Rob Roy McGregor so as to imitate the persecuting spirit of England toward Scotland two hundred years ago.

That bill was entitled "A bill for full and general grace, amnesty, and oblivion of all wrongful acts, doings, and omissions of all persons engaged in the war of the late rebellion." It was the first step outside of particular personal amnesty. It was outside of partial reprieval. That bill was a measure of proscription in the guise of clemency. Its mercy was as meager as its title was misnamed. It was almost a joke and a solecism. The exceptions gave memory to oblivion and punishment in pardon. It was Lethe, all alive and rushing like a western river in a freshet. [Laughter.] It was a plan of salvation based on a scheme of damnation. It eternized hate. It made healing impossible. What was its design? It quieted nothing. It was a bill of pains, penalties, and litigation. But it had an insidious object. It was an act of oblivion for the agents and officers of the United States engaged in reconstruction!

What a commentary! This kind of mercy was not strained. It dropped like the gentle dew of heaven upon the tools and parasites who had harassed and oppressed a conquered people.

What had they been doing, your sweetly-scented agents of reconstruction, that you should have amnestied them? Had they been stealing? Had they been tyrannizing? Had they been upturning Legislatures? Had they been running riot among a helpless and conquered people? The unconscionable scoundrels, who were sunk in the sloughs of a general degradation, were allowed vitally to bubble from their Lethe!

That is one chapter of your amnesty. I wonder the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] did not have that section inserted with his other exceptions in his amendment to this bill. That bill, however, was too bad to pass. Even this House could not stand it, and they sent it to a committee; they postponed it on a certain day, on the 11th of January, 1871. It came back, however, in March, 1871, on a motion to reconsider, and it finally passed as amended on motion of Judge Poland, of Vermont. But then the amendment was full of exceptions as to Army and naval officers and those who had voted for ordinances of secession. When that bill passed by 120 to 82, it went to the Senate, and there also it was choked to death like all the others.

Then came the Forty-third Congress; then came the lifting up of the voice of the people. Then you found that the people were demanding that a highway should be cast up and a standard be lifted for them! Then came the moral power of the people. And, although we had kukluxes, and investigations, and all sorts of provocations, and troubles, and atrocities, and recriminations, and threats, yet one day, all at once, to the astonishment of my honored colleague who sits before me, on the Committee on Rules, [Mr. RANDALL,] and myself, it was proposed in the presence of a full committee (and I know where they met) to introduce a general amnesty bill.

This bill was unincumbered with litigations and punishments. It was couched in the language of liberality. It had the grace of all religions and the philosophy of all political eras. It was the product of goodness!

I do not think the House ever instructed the Committee on Rules on that subject. But no matter for that. There was something going on that I could not understand nor did my colleague, [Mr. RANDALL.] It was found out that your policy was arousing hate and losing you what little respect you had in the South. You proposed in that committee to bring in a bill of general amnesty. It was proposed that Mr. Maynard should draw up that bill without any exceptions. I do not say the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] proposed it, but it was proposed, and he was present and made no objection to it. And if you appeal here to your God, I appeal to my colleague and to my God and to the RECORD. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. I observe that the gentleman, following the example of Dogberry, puts his colleague first. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. I will give you enough of the dog before I get through. [Renewed laughter.] Then I would appeal not merely to Providence, nor to my colleague, but I will appeal to the RECORD to show that a bill almost identical with the one now opposed by the honorable and distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] then received his acquiescence. I read from the RECORD:

Mr. MAYNARD. I am instructed by the Committee on Rules, acting upon a resolution submitted to them the other day—

There was a resolution—

To report the bill which I send to the desk.

Now that shows that there was some solemn concord among our republican brethren to bring this general amnesty about at that time for some purpose.

This bill which I now send to the desk has met the unanimous approval of the Committee on Rules.

Who constituted that committee at that time? JAMES G. BLAINE, Speaker, and, ex officio, chairman of the Committee on Rules. JAMES A. GARFIELD. He still stands out nobly, as I am told, for an unexceptional amnesty. I see it in his benignant smile. [Laughter.] Horace Maynard, SAMUEL J. RANDALL, and another, who perhaps is not so good as some of the others of the committee.

How can I picture the scene of the new transfiguration! I was rejoiced in my heart of hearts. It looked like the good old times again. I wanted something of that kind. My heart had been yearning for these men who had been erring. I wanted them back in the track of the Government. When Mr. Maynard made the proposition his swart features and tall figure shone as it were with a supernal light. The other gentleman [Mr. GARFIELD, of Ohio] seemed to have an aureole around his brow. [Laughter.] And as for the gentleman from Pennsylvania, my colleague, why he was illumined with a sort of centennial halo. [Great laughter.] As for the gentleman from Maine, I can recall how he looked on that occasion. Instinct with some patriotic light, he reminded me of the Apocalyptic angel, which shone so bright and beautiful it was impossible to look upon him. [Great laughter.]

Alas! alas! I was afraid then that there was some party emergency, and that it would pass away as the bill passed to the Senate. Alas! alas! that the grace with which my colleague [Mr. RANDALL] and myself yielded the direction and management of this democratic bill to our republican colleagues should have been so little appreciated. Ah, then I knew that the honorable member from Maine had been perusing history. He had read of Claverhouse and his merry men of blood, and of Hoche and his conciliation of La Vendée. He had read of Ireland, Poland, and what not of woes to conquered people.

That Maynard bill was reported to the House. What then? Where was my friend, the Ex-Speaker, then? In the chair? At home? No; he sent down to a member to do something that he did not want to do himself. Why, I am surprised and mortified at the gentleman from Maine sending down to another member—a colored member, too, I believe it was—to do what he had not the courage to do himself; and that was to have Jefferson Davis excluded from the operation of that bill. Is that the statement? Is that correct?

Mr. BLAINE. As the gentleman puts the question to me, I desire to make a little explanation for just a moment. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. COX. Certainly.

Mr. BLAINE. What the gentleman states is in the main correct. I can state it more fully. Mr. Maynard was especially anxious to report the amnesty bill. He had certain reasons which I do not fully know, and if I did I should not feel at liberty to disclose them. He asked me personally in committee not to urge my objections to it. I had great respect and friendship for him, and I was willing that he might report it. But I had a conversation with several gentlemen on the floor in regard to the inexpediency of allowing it to pass. But there was at that time—and I know the gentleman will thank me for this piece of information——

Mr. COX. We are always thankful for anything from you.

Mr. BLAINE. I found there was an expectation on our side that the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] and his associates would be very kindly disposed toward the civil-rights bill if general amnesty should be passed. I asked the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAINEY] to offer the ammendment referred to; and he will oblige me by stating whether his recollection agrees with mine as to his reply.

Mr. RAINEY. I remember the circumstances perfectly well. I declined, for fear that my motives might be misrepresented in the South.

Mr. BLAINE. He said he would not like to do it for many reasons, and among other things because it might prejudice the civil-rights bill, in which he felt a very deep interest. I thought then, as I have already stated, that the bill in such a form as to include Mr. Davis ought not to have gone through. I was in the chair; I could not myself object to the bill; and it took the course which the gentleman himself has indicated. Now will the gentleman please state to me whether there was any little understanding that he and his colleagues would be lenient toward the civil-rights bill, and whether they kept faith on that point?

Mr. RANDALL. There was no such understanding; none in the world.

Mr. COX. Never! never! never!

Mr. RANDALL. And my subsequent conduct when the bill was under consideration gives a contradiction to it.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not accuse the gentleman of violating such an understanding. The subsequent conduct of that side of the House showed very plainly that if there had been such an understanding they did not observe it.

Mr. COX. Now, I think the gentleman from Maine has only made the matter worse. He has said that he had one object in committee and another outside of the committee. He had some secret political purpose. Is that the statesmanship that aspires to the Presidency? [Laughter.] That is to say, while he was ready to acquiesce from personal regard for our present minister to Constantinople, Mr. Maynard; while he would not make trouble in the committee; yet when he is outside of the committee, he seeks a colored member and through him tries to make an objection. Yet, sir, the gentleman sat here then in this House as the guardian of honor and honesty. And while Mr. Maynard says "I am authorized to report this bill unanimously," the gentleman from Maine was as dumb as an oyster.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman confuses all distinctions. I was perfectly willing that the bill should come before the House; and I have moved to reconsider the vote on this bill in order to bring it before the House.

Mr. RANDALL. Did the gentleman ever offer in committee any amendment to except Jefferson Davis?

Mr. BLAINE. No, sir, I did not; but——

Mr. COX. That is enough.

Mr. BLAINE. But I was willing to bring the bill before the House, as I am willing to bring this bill before the House.

Mr. COX. Now I want to give the gentleman a little more of this. If he would not undertake to interrupt me quite so much, he would feel a good deal better. He is somewhat like the little boy down in Memphis who undertook to take a twist with a mule's tail; his father said to him afterward, "You don't look so pretty as you did, my boy, but you have learned something." [Great laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] represent the mule in that illustration? [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. COX. Now, Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the last remark of the gentleman from Maine, but I suppose it was one of the soft and yielding speeches which he is capable of making. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. Does the gentleman want me to repeat it? [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. O, no! I have the floor. [Laughter.]

Then Mr. Maynard rose. There never was such an opportunity (and I would seize it if I were not a little merciful and did not feel amnestically) in which to run a knife quietly into the gentleman from Maine and turn it round. But I am inclined to deal gently with him. [Laughter.] This is an amnestical occasion.

Mr. Maynard then arose and moved the previous question. Mr. LAWRENCE inquired, would not that admit Jefferson Davis to a seat upon this floor. I remember that Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. [Laughter.] No wonder he got alarmed when he found that the whole committee were unanimous, including the gentleman from Maine. Mr. LAWRENCE said: "I object to it." Mr. HOAR then made an inquiry and a point of order. Mr. Butler, of Massachusetts, insisted on the point of order. Mr. Maynard said:

I move to suspend the rules, so as to allow the committee to report this bill and to pass it. And in answer to the question propounded by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] I tell him frankly that this bill will, if enacted, admit the president of the southern confederacy, just as the vice-president has been already admitted, to a seat in either House of Congress, provided the people where he lives shall think proper to send him here. It is general amnesty as recommended by the President.

Mr. COX. Is there any objection to passing it unanimously? The President recommends amnesty; and let us unanimously wind up this foolish business of taking the test-oath.

There was no question then, no clamor then to adopting the amendment from that side. Gentlemen perfectly understood that Jefferson Davis was in the bill.

What magic had worked this wondrous change? The thought of it affected my sensibilities. At once, my mind received a repulsion. I was ashamed of my own poor political intolerance. All my life I had been a partisan. Democracy to me had been a delusive glory. I was almost persuaded that my service in Congress had been a mistake. I should have been a republican. That after all the kukluxism, not to speak of the rebellion and all the recriminations against the proscriptive party, including the soldierly GARFIELD and the belligerent BLAINE, to find them, them in a moment—as it were, in the twinkling of an eye—and out of some great patriotic purpose, yielding so sweetly to the claims of clemency, with such magnificent magnanimity—this was much. But when the tall, gaunt form of Maynard seemed to my new vision like one of the "better angels of our nature," it was for a moment too, too much for me. Catching the contagion of kindness, thus illustrated by this committee, we authorized the noble Maynard to take our united thought and crystallize it into the form of this bill of my colleague, [Mr. RANDALL.] We allowed him to present it to the House. The proceedings when this was done are beautiful to read. They are found immortalized on page 91 of the RECORD of the first session of the Forty-third Congress, December 8, 1873. It was, he said, "the unanimous report of the committee." I think I see his tall form now as he is calling the previous question. With a pinch of snuff between his thumb and forefinger, extended into the glowing light shed through these escutcheons of our independent States, he is about to say that President Grant favored the general amnesty, when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] inquired "if the bill admits Jeff. Davis to a seat on this floor." Did Mr. Maynard shrink from such terrific inquisition? He did not. The bill passed—ayes 141, noes 29. Was there no Speaker, to spring from his exalted seat, to scream out, like a Robespierrean, "Jefferson Davis à la lanterne?" Was there no stentorian voice from the gentleman from Maine, "Down, down forever, with the toad-spotted traitor?" Justice compels me to say there was not. Silently acquiescing with dignity and pride in the action of his committee, the bill passed, from the House to the Senate, where ruthless proscription killed it to keep alive the saddest of memories and the very embers of despair!

Now what a change have we here to-day, and for what purpose? Why do you oppose now your own measure? Why make exception? Why not breathe the old spirit of Sir Thomas Browne, which I once quoted here: "You should draw the curtain for the purpose of hiding injury." No partial pardon, for that is no pardon at all. Gentlemen will find that out, if not in this world, in the other. [Laughter.] Why give a partial amnesty? It is not amnesty if it is partial. It is exceptional, and therefore not in any sense clemency.

It is not difficult to attribute motives to gentlemen on this floor, but I will not do it. The gentleman from Maine is known to be a candidate for the presidency, but that is no reason why he should be a mean man. [Laughter.] He is not; but, on the contrary, a kind-hearted, generous, noble citizen of Pennsylvania and of the State of Maine, representing, as I do here sometimes, two States all at once. [Laughter.] He is the last man to whom I would attribute any bad motives.

But one thing is curious, that he has antagonized President Grant on this subject. I do not like the look of that. [Laughter.] I call upon the republican gentlemen, especially that godly little knot of colored people who voted so nobly for the third term, to vote down this exceptionally obnoxious proposition of the gentleman from Maine. For did not the President of the United States in his message of December, 1873, say this:

> I will renew my previous recommendation to Congress for general amnesty. The number engaged in the rebellion still laboring under disabilities is very small, but enough to keep up a constant irritation. No possible danger can accrue to the Government by restoring them to eligibility to hold office.

This was general amnesty. Why General Grant even did not favor any exception! He was a soldier. He was not a "scurvy politician." General Grant fought in the war, and made a report in 1865 that you southern men were all right then, contented, acquiescent in the Government. He never believed in this revengeful system. True, he has made some little trouble down South in Arkansas and Louisiana and other places, despoiled a few States with his bayonets, and made a good deal of trouble with these gentlemen here around me But he never proposed this exceptional, partial amnesty.

Must we of the opposition, who are observing the coming conflict in the republican party, conclude from this and other signs that this amnestical expression of the President has driven his competitor from Maine into the arms of Jefferson Davis? Must we infer that, to raise a spirit against Cæsar, he is compelled to give Jefferson Davis the crown of martyrdom? Is it here that we find the solution? The generous pursuit of arms has made our Cæsar tender to the South. Must we compare the politician with the soldier? Both are ambitious; the one is as obdurate as the rock-bound coasts of Maine to the claims of mercy; while we are told that—

> The warrior's heart, when touched by her,
> Can as downy, soft, and yielding be
> As his own white plume, that high amid death
> Through the field hath shone, yet moveth with a breath.

How shall I contrast the conduct of the honorable gentleman from Maine with that of General Grant without giving my views on the presidential question? [Laughter.]

Now, in conclusion, I wish to recall one thought to the gentleman from Maine and to this House. We have come together here by some tidal wave; these gentlemen from the South have been sitting here taking your little contemptible insults about our organization and our conduct when you knew or you might have known that, in the organization of this House, more maimed Union soldiers have been appointed under democratic administration here this winter according to the number of those appointed than were appointed by your radical Mr. Buxton in the last Congress. [Applause.] And yet you have sent your slanders all over the country. To do what? To prejudice this body of men here, who have quietly taken your taunts and your insults. If you want the facts on that subject, go to Colonel Fitzhugh, our Doorkeeper. You will find that, according to the number appointed, in proportion to the service, fewer Union soldiers were appointed by you than we have this year. There is no reason why you should send out to the country the cry this is the "ex-confederate congress." Many of you will be "ex's" yourselves before you get through with this business. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I like to speak of amnesty. It is a favorite theme. I was delighted at the idea of getting a majority of 3 five years ago. But here, after ten years of struggle, after ten years of contempt, after every faithful expression possible from southern gentlemen and statesmen, including Jefferson Davis; after all that can be said by them of their adherence to the sentiments of patriotism and union, we have, in this year of jubilee, 1876, the distinguished member from Maine raking up again the embers of dead hates for some bad purpose—I may as well tell all I think about it, [laughter,]— a bad, mischievous, malicious purpose, which will never elect him to the Presidency if he lives a thousand years. [Applause.] I do not ask anybody to applaud these sentiments. They will speak for themselves without applause. But I remember, and the gentleman from Maine may recall the fact, when a member of this House, a distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, now deceased, Judge Woodward, once sent to my desk to be read the one hundred and twenty-sixth Psalm. I think I will read it for the benefit of the gentleman. It was after Cyrus had relieved the Hebrews from captivity. The Psalmist touched his harp, and broke forth in the lyric loftiness of gratulation:

> 1. When the Lord turned again the captivity of Zion, we were like them that dream.
> 2. Then was our mouth filled with laughter, and our tongue with singing: then said they among the heathen, The Lord hath done great things for them.
> 3. The Lord hath done great things for us; whereof we are glad.
> 4. Turn again our captivity, O Lord, as the streams in the south.

There is an annotation by Dr. Clarke to this psalm which in connection with it may very well be pondered. It recites that once when the Roman general had overcome Philip of Macedon and conquered Greece, and had put all the cities of Greece under taxation and tyranny, there was a gathering of the people in the circus at the Isthmian games, and without the previous knowledge of any one except the general in command of the city, the herald, as he proclaimed the games, was authorized to proclaim in behalf of the Roman senate and the general of the army to the citizens that their taxes should remain forever abolished, and that no record or rule should remain of the tyranny which had been exercised by the Romans over the Greeks. All the people listened as if it had been an illusion. They were in a dream, like the Jews when relieved from captivity. They turned one to another, and said: "What means this; what did the herald say after he blew the trumpet? Have we been given our liberty?" One said to the other, "Did you hear what was said?" And they went to the herald, and cried, "Repeat to us what you have said;" and he repeated it, and their hearts were full of gladness. Says Livy, "They lifted up their hearts and rejoiced, for the year of their deliverance had come." It was the year of Grecian jubilee. And now, when our jubilee has come in this year of 1876, I would like to have a herald from Philadelphia, or from this Capital, to sound the trumpet and proclaim deliverance to the South from republican exactions, from bad rule, and the establishment of autonomy all through the South. Then a glorious, blessed light coming from above—the white radiance of eternity itself—will shine upon architrave, pillar, and dome of the temple of our American freedom! [Applause.]

Mr. KELLEY obtained the floor.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] one question?

Mr. KELLEY. I will yield for a moment for that purpose.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman from New York said something in the course of his remarks about his having spoken here against the policy of poisoning wells, and other things of that kind.

Mr. COX. I was trying to illustrate the moderation and humanity of the law as it should obtain among civilized countries.

Mr. BLAINE. Then the gentleman did not mean to imply in so speaking that the Government had pursued any such policy?

Mr. COX. I was speaking of the rules prevailing among civilized nations.

Mr. BLAINE. Did the gentleman mean to imply by the remotest implication that the Government of the United States was resorting to any such measures as that?

Mr. COX. I never had such an idea in my life, and I will correct it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD if I expressed myself wrongly.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I voted for the bill of my colleague, [Mr. RANDALL,] and not to have done so would have shown me false to cherished and often-expressed convictions. I appreciate my temerity in dissenting from my distinguished friend, the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLANIE,] and in attempting to temper the influence of his fervid, eloquent, and magnetic speech and the terrible array of facts with which it was charged. Yet, sir, I feel it due to myself and to the republican party to appeal to my friends on this side of the House to vote for amnesty, general and unqualified. [Loud applause on the floor and in the gallery.] My life as a member of this House is a little longer than that of my distinguished friend. I was here throughout the war. Abraham Lincoln's summons brought me here to the extra session of July 4, 1861, which was convened for the purpose of providing means for the preservation of the Union; and while the war lasted I voted for the most urgent and the harshest measures as in my judgment those characterized by the highest degree of benevolence. Nothing is so cruel as protracted and slow-wasting war.

The first time my voice was heard in this Hall to utter more than "yea" or "nay" was to complain of the gloved war then being waged by General McClellan. When Mr. Vallandigham, of Ohio, had taunted the Government with its weakness, as he called it, in surrendering the Trent prisoners, I made my maiden speech in an impromptu reply and said that I did not fear war with England from that recognition of international law, but that I did fear it from our want of courage, military capacity, or power. I remember this then important incident in my life as though it were but yesterday, and that I said "Let England hear the rattle of musketry and the roar of cannon and read the lists of the killed and wounded in battle, and thus learn that we are really engaged in war, and she will not interfere, for England respects power, however much she may be inclined to disregard the requirements of international law when dealing with feeble powers;" and when the war had closed I would not have grieved, but might have shouted for joy, had I learned that Jeff. Davis's person had adorned the branch of a "sour-apple tree." I never in his best estate regarded his character as a lovely one, and therefore I do not speak for him, but for my country and its honor.

The report from which the eloquent gentleman from Maine read the terrible story of the horrors of Andersonville was made in 1867. The Government knew then all that he has recited to-day in order to harrow our feelings and sway our judgment. Jefferson Davis was its prisoner. I do not remember just how long he was held in confinement. Then he was bailed, Horace Greeley and other men like him in the North being his bondsmen and amply responsible for his production for trial at any time. If he were guilty of crime beyond all others, why was he not tried? When Wirz was tried and executed the Government that sentenced and executed him knew this whole story of Jefferson Davis's relation to his crimes? Why did they not try him then? Shall we republicans to-day reflect by an implied vote of censure upon those who have administered the Government through all the intervening years from the close of the rebellion until now by attempting to punish him for that which they, day by day, week by week, month by month, and year by year, have condoned? Do not let this country convey to foreigners the idea that any one man within the broad limit of our country, any one man among the forty millions of our people, is so powerful for evil that we dare not grant him amnesty. The gentleman says that that is not the reason why he would except him. Why, the story he read from the report of the Committee on the Conduct of the War came to us all almost as news. Many of us had not heard it, and those who had had forgotten it. The incidents so shocking to humanity had passed into oblivion.

How, then, can you expect foreigners, who never before heard of these revolting details, to understand your subtle motive? And if they were spread before them they would say, "How illogical to have let a man who had caused such crimes to be perpetrated enjoy immunity for ten years, and now to constructively punish him for them." They would all believe that the chief of the confederacy was deemed so powerful for evil that the American Government dared not formally invest him with rights which he had forfeited in common with the entire white population of the South and which it had practically restored to him by the force of the reasons which underlie statutes of limitations; knowing that the second officer of the confederacy can be here and be honored Congress after Congress with the right to select his seat before the drawing for seats is begun, they would believe that this other man is believed to possess such power for evil, is so satanic in his power—and when I use that word I accept it as representing the one power which all the world regards as able to compete in evil with Omnipotence itself—for if his power be not of that kind then we may well admit him. To thus distinguish Jefferson Davis is to honor him overmuch.

Sir, I have not thrown myself into this controversy voluntarily. On the 5th of May, 1873, I enjoyed the ear of this House. My health and strength were prostrated; and, in order that the words I was to utter might be heard by southern members, I, for the first time in my fourteen years' service here, spoke from the other side of the Hall. I was pleading for means with which to prepare for a year of jubilee. I was pleading with Congress to appropriate a small amount of money, but to so apply it that all the world might see that the Union had been restored and might contemplate the power and resources of that restored Union.

And I ask leave to bring to the attention of the House a few words that I uttered on that occasion; and those of you who may chance to remember them and those who hear them now for the first time will believe that I have not rushed into this controversy, but have come into it to make good my words, and because consistency demanded such action at my hands. I was pleading for a centennial celebration, and was pointing out the material advantages that would result to us as a people. I had referred to its effect in bringing us immigrants, capital, skill, and I turned from these themes and said:

> But I desire to say that, while this bill appeals to our cupidity and our hope of the development of our national resources, it appeals to me with far higher, more noble motives. Let us once more remind ourselves and show the world that our old motto "E pluribus unum" still has a vital significance. The American States, as States, have never appeared in an international exhibition. At London, at Paris, at Vienna there was an "American department," containing a few specimens from a few of our States. There was nothing there to tell the people of Europe that we were thirty-seven States in one Union. There was nothing there to tell the visitors at those exhibitions anything of our vast territories and their boundless wealth out of which more States are yet to be carved. It was the "American department."
> Here on our own soil, if generous emulation animates us, if we shall be stimulated by that wholesome rivalry which gives warmth to fraternal affection, he who comes from another land will see our political organization and our geography written in the very form and construction of the building. Let us, forgetting all past differences, rally together, breast to breast and heart to heart, as a united people, challenging the world to generous controversy. Let us ally ourselves, men of the North and of the South, as our fathers did for war a century ago, and win a peaceful triumph that shall redound to the honor of our country as grandly and enduringly as did the victories achieved in war by our fathers. Let us also make this centennial year a year of jubilee, in which we shall proclaim to the world that, though when the century began slavery was co-extensive with our whole country, to-day no slave can breathe our atmosphere; that at the close of the bloodiest internecine struggle that history records, or within ten years after its close, there is no state prisoner within our limits, no citizen under banishment, no citizen disfranchised for aught else than crime not of a political character, after conviction by his peers and the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction. Let us thus prove to them that republicanism is peace and order and liberty, and that a single century of it, though it has not erased the word "treason" from our statute-book, has rendered it an obsolete term in the estimation of every American jurist.

In repeating these words, I implore this side of the House to disregard all excitement and all feeling, and make the centennial year a year of jubilee, proclaiming to the world that no man stands disfranchised for any political conduct or for any political crime for which he might have been tried ten years ago, but in full recognition of which he has been allowed to walk unchallenged during the long interval.

He is now dead. This lady and her friends believe that the court-martial was not fairly conducted, and that the charge was entirely groundless, and she thinks she proves it by the testimony which she submits herewith. I commend the case to the careful consideration of the Committee on Military Affairs, to which committee I move its reference.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES presented the petition of the Congregational church of Shrewsbury, Massachusetts, signed by the pastor and officers, and the petition of the Methodist church of Swampscott, Massachusetts, signed by its pastor and officers, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HARVEY. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 34) to confirm pre-emption and homestead entries of public lands within the limits of railroads in cases where such entries have been made under the regulations of the Land Department, have had the same under consideration, and directed me to report the bill back without amendment and recommend its passage. As the subject-matter of this bill is of great importance, and as several Senators have indicated a desire to debate it, I wish now to give notice that on next Tuesday, or as soon thereafter as I can obtain the floor, I shall call the bill up for consideration, hoping to reach a vote upon it at an early day.

LIBRARIAN'S REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following resolution, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That five hundred extra copies of the annual report of the Librarian of Congress for the year 1875 be printed, with paper covers, for distribution by the Librarian.

NAVAL MONUMENT.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 83) providing for the completion and location of the naval monument, have instructed me to report back the same without amendment and recommend its passage. This bill substantially passed at the last session, and is to provide for the erection of a monument in memory of their brethren who fell in defense of the Union, the expense of which has been paid by the officers of the Navy. I see no reason why it should not be put on its passage now, and I hope there will be no objection.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The preamble recites that the officers of the Navy propose to procure a fitting monument to the memory of the officers, seamen, and marines of the Navy who gave up their lives in the defense of their country during the late civil war, and for this purpose have raised by voluntary subscription a sum sufficient to pay Franklin Simmons, the sculptor, therefor; and that it appears, from a communication from Admiral Porter, that the officers of the Navy would be willing that the monument referred to should be placed on some suitable part of the public grounds in Washington, provided the Government will assume the cost of finishing a small portion and erecting the work.

The bill appropriates $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, for the purpose of completing the statue of "Peace," platform, steps, and circular basin of the naval monument contracted for by the officers of the Navy with Franklin Simmons, and placing the same on some appropriate part of the public grounds in Washington. The Secretary of the Navy, the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate, the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House of Representatives, and Frederick Law Olmsted are appointed a committee to select and designate such place upon the public grounds for the erection of the monument as in their judgment shall be most appropriate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I happen to know something about this undertaking, and have examined the plan and design of the monument; and I must say that, in my judgment, it will be a very elegant monument, something like forty feet high. It has been gotten up entirely at the expense of the officers of the Navy. I think it is a very generous gift on their part. I wish the officers of the Army would do a similar thing, and I have no doubt there are places on the public grounds that would be very much adorned by either or both of such monuments.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF RULES.

Mr. MERRIMON. The Committee on Rules, to whom was referred the resolution introduced by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] to amend the twenty-fifth rule of the Senate, so that bills may be introduced without previous notice, have instructed me to report the same back adversely.

I beg to say that originally there were no standing committees in the Senate; when a bill was introduced it was by leave, and a committee was raised to prepare a bill which would embody the motion. The first rule on the subject was this, adopted April 7, 1789:

Every bill shall be introduced by motion for leave or by an order of the House on the report of a committee, and in either case a committee to prepare the same shall be appointed. In cases of a general nature, one day's notice at least shall be given of the motion to bring in a bill, and every such motion may be committed.

November 13, 1794, this rule was adopted:

Every bill shall be introduced by motion for leave or by an order of the House on the report of a committee, and in either case a committee to prepare the same shall be appointed. In cases of a general nature one day's notice at least shall be given of the motion to bring in a bill, and every such motion may be committed.

In the Annals of Congress, first volume, page 21, the action of the Senate upon the subject will be found. The rule was subsequently amended to read:

RULE 12. One day's notice at least shall be given of an intended motion for leave to bring in a bill.

Here is an extract from the Journal showing how the proceedings were had:

December 6, 1799.—"Mr. Dexter notified the Senate that he should, on Monday next, ask leave to bring in a bill to revive the act entitled 'An act for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt.'"

* * * * * * * *

December 9, 1799.—"Agreeably to notice given, Mr. Dexter had leave to bring in a bill to revive the act entitled, &c., * * * which was read; and by unanimous consent the bill was read the second time.

"Ordered, That it be referred to Messrs. Dexter, Lawrence, and Tracy, to consider and report thereon to the Senate."

The object of the present rule was twofold: first, to give notice to the Senate that a bill of a particular nature was about to be introduced, so that any Senator who desired to speak to it at the moment of introduction might be prepared to do so; and, next, to prevent any Senator from introducing a bill and having whatever action he might see fit to take in connection with his motion spread upon the Journal when such a bill or such a motion might be distasteful to the Senate. The committee, upon consideration, regard this feature of the rule as having a very conservative tendency. If any one should desire to speak to the merits of a bill at the time of its introduction, another Senator might suggest that the rule must be observed, that notice should be given, and this would afford an opportunity to present any objections or to say what he might see fit in that connection.

But there is another important feature. Although one can scarcely conceive that a Senator would do so, it might be that in times of high excitement or for purposes of malignity a Senator would introduce a paper that might be insulting to the Senate or to a large body of it. In that case the Senate would have the notice of such a motion, and proper action might be taken in order to prevent its presentment to the Senate or prevent it from going upon the Journal or appearing at all.

I repeat that the committee have instructed me to say (and I believe the committee were unanimous in that) that this rule is regarded as having a very conservative influence, and they think it would be unwise to modify it in the respect proposed by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. MORTON. I take it, from the remarks of the Senator from North Carolina, that the committee has totally misapprehended the object of my resolution. I did not introduce a resolution to take away the right to make an objection to the introduction of a bill where one day's notice had not been given, but my resolution was simply to dispense with the idle formality of saying, "I ask leave to introduce a bill without having given previous notice," a thing that is never refused, and yet it is printed sometimes fifty times in the proceedings of one morning, requiring a large space in the minutes, costing hundreds of dollars to print it in the course of a session, and absolutely without any sort of use. I propose to dispense with this idle formality and at the same time to leave to Senators the right to object to the introduction of a bill where previous notice has not been given, reserving the right to require the bill to lie over one day in that case. I will read my resolution:

Resolved, That the twenty-fifth rule of the Senate be so amended that bills may be introduced without previous notice unless objection is made, and that it shall not be necessary to state in the minutes that leave was given to introduce a bill without previous notice.

My object was simply to dispense with that idle formality. We hear the minutes read here every morning. For twenty minutes the Secretary is kept saying "the Senator from North Carolina," or "the Senator from Missouri," "asked leave to introduce a bill without previous notice, and leave was given to introduce the bill." But it is not only the time taken here; it is the cost of printing. This custom as it exists I think is absolutely without any use; but if I offer to introduce a bill which the Senator from North Carolina or any other Senator thinks is not of a proper character, he can then make his objection.

At the same time I will say, Mr. President, that the reason for this rule in the first place has entirely passed away. My friend from North Carolina has shown that the rule was introduced at a time when there were no standing committees of this body and when every bill that was considered had to be referred to a special committee. Every bill was therefore a far more troublesome matter than it is now. As each bill had to go to a special committee, it was considered proper that no bill should be introduced without giving previous notice, and objection was sometimes then made to a bill on its first introduction—a thing that is never done now.

I submit to my friend from North Carolina that the committee has entirely mistaken the object I had in view.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the indefinite postponement of the resolution, as recommended by the committee.

Mr. MORTON. I suggest that this matter be recommitted to the committee. I desire the committee to act upon it in the sense in which the resolution was introduced. I do not, and did not, ask to take away the right to object to the introduction of a bill, but to dispense with this idle formality here on the floor of the Senate, which is afterward reproduced in the minutes sometimes fifty times a day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator whether, by retaining the right to object, he means the right of a single individual to postpone the question of introducing a single bill until the next day on objection, or merely to raise the question then and have it passed upon instantly?

Mr. MORTON. Whatever the effect of the rule is now by requiring leave to introduce, I am willing to reserve that right. I do not propose to dispense with that, but simply to get clear of what has been a bore to us, I think, ever since I have been in the Senate, and, probably, for a great many years before.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think, and I have observed it to be useful as well, that the substance of the present rule—I am not speaking as to how it should be entered in the Journal or in the RECORD—but the substance of the present rule is very wholesome. The theory of it, as I understand, is that no member shall have a right to force the Senate into the reception of a bill without a day's previous notice; so that Senators who may be interested on the other side, or if it is something that they think ought not to be brought in at all, may have fair notice, and be here. Now, if you change the rule so that a majority of the body can, without any previous knowledge of the other Senators who may not be present on that particular day, bring in a bill and pass it to its first stage, then you lose the benefit of this security against surprise which the present rule gives us. But, if I now understand my friend from Indiana, he does not propose to change the substance of the rule.

Mr. MORTON. Will my friend allow me one moment to explain? I would make the rule what I think it is in regard to Senate resolutions. A resolution is introduced here, and if no objection is made it may be considered on the same day; but if any one wants it to lie over until to-morrow, it goes over. I would have the same rule in regard to bills, and not make it necessary to go over the "ask leave to introduce" in speech or in print.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I cannot concur in that view as to bills. It often happens as to bills that a bill is proposed which a majority of this body does not think ought to be brought in at all—which ought not to be considered. As to Senate resolutions, the scope of which of course is very narrow, usually relating to some right or proceeding of the Senate itself, the rule is otherwise, I take it, and anybody has a right to introduce a resolution. It cannot be considered on that day, but it is in the possession of the Senate, and goes over when objection is made. Now, as to a bill, the present rules do not allow that, and I do not think they ought to. We have had a notable instance within my recollection and that of my friend from Indiana, where a very large majority of this body thought it was unfit that a bill, or a joint resolution, which is of course substantially the same thing, should be brought in at all. I think it was a joint resolution offered by one of the Senators from Kentucky, looking to the disposal of Arlington, where the Union soldiers are buried, and in strict accordance with the rules objection was made when he asked unanimous consent to its being brought in at all. Notice was accordingly given that on the next day he would move for leave to bring it in. He did move, and the question came up whether he should have leave to bring in the bill for consideration at all; and the Senate, by a large majority, and as I thought rightly, declined to grant him that leave. I wish to preserve the substance of that rule for just such cases.

Mr. MORTON. There is no difference between me and my friend from Vermont upon this question. The rule in substance now is just as I would leave it. A member asks leave to introduce a bill without previous notice. It is an idle formality, and has never been refused but once since I have been in this body, and I remember that was on an objection made by Mr. Davis, of Kentucky. I would dispense with this formal asking of leave; I would dispense with the formal granting of leave in the minutes, and if I introduce a bill leave it as the right of every Senator to have the bill go over until to-morrow.

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not think that the remarks of the Senator from Indiana cover the whole case, and particularly the merits of one feature of it. If I rise to introduce a bill I say, "I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill." At once it is sent to the Clerk's desk; the Clerk reads the bill by the title, and it goes upon the Journal. It is obliged to go there under the rule. If I am bound to give notice of that bill one day, I state that I give notice that I will introduce a bill to-morrow, or at some future day, for a particular purpose. If some one, thinking that bill is not one fit to be introduced, shall look into the matter, when I come to offer it to-morrow he says, "I object to the introduction of that bill, and I assign this reason, and the other reason, and another reason why it ought not to be introduced at all; it ought not to have place upon the Journals of this body at all; it is not a bill fit to go upon the Journals." In that case nothing would appear except the notice of the bill. Under the plan that the Senator proposes, every Senator introduces a bill as a matter of course, unless somebody who is not on the alert, not expecting such a thing, rises in his place and says, "I object to that bill being introduced."

This rule has been in existence for a long period of time, and, for one, I am not disposed to unsettle that which is settled, and which has proved beneficial by a long course of practice in the Senate. The Senator says there was a time when it was more difficult to introduce a bill and get it before the Senate than now. I beg to say to him and to the Senate that I think it would be very wise and well if bills could not be bronght before the Senate so easily as they are now. We know by experience—I know by my little experience in this body—that scores of bills are introduced which had much better never have been introduced.

I do not care to debate this matter. I have no personal interest in it. The report I have made is the unanimous opinion of the committee. One of the committee, a gentleman who has been in the Senate for a long time, who presided in this body as Vice-President of the United States, and who has had large experience in administering the rules, is decidedly of opinion that it is wholesome—that it exerts a wholesome influence. As to the cost, that is a mere drop in the ocean; it is as nothing compared with the conservative influence that this rule exerts over our deliberations and proceedings.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I care nothing about this matter. I offered the resolution to avoid some expense, but the Senator says the expense is trifling. Perhaps it may not be over a thousand dollars a session, and that, he says, is a mere drop in the bucket. I agree to that; but still these drops in the bucket sometimes make the bucket full, and in these days of democratic retrenchment and reform I think even the saving of a thousand dollars a year is not a matter to be sneezed at. But my suggestion was to recommit the resolution because the committee did not seem to understand its purpose at all. They seem to have supposed that I was proposing to do away with the right to object to the introduction of a bill. I had no such idea. I think the committee had better take it again.

Mr. ANTHONY. There seems to be such misapprehension as to the effect of the rule and the amendment that certainly I think the matter should be recommitted to the committee. I hope that will be done.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I have listened to the Senator from Indiana, and I fail to see that I misapprehended the scope of his resolution. If I understand him now, I certainly did not fail to apprehend it in committee. The objection to changing the rule is this: As the rule now stands, no Senator, as a matter of right, can put a bill before this body—introduce it without notice. The Senator virtually proposes to do away with that. That is the reason why, in my judgment, what he proposes should not be done. You may presume extreme cases where bills offensive to the body are offered. Although I may have a right to offer such a bill, as I offer a resolution or a memorial, while parliamentary law says neither of those things shall be done in a manner offensive to the body, yet such a thing may be; and it is certainly within my knowledge that the right to present many bills has been refused. It is a little troublesome to observe in all respects this rule, I grant, but it is conservative in its action; it serves to protect the body, if you please, against extreme cases, and I think we had better keep the rule as it is.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I have been very unfortunate, or else the Senator from Maine does not comprehend the purpose of my motion. As the rule now stands, if I introduce a bill I must "ask the leave of the Senate to introduce a bill without having given previous notice." If no objection is made it is understood that that leave is granted, and all this is printed in the minutes the next morning. Now, I would dispense with asking that leave; I would dispense with printing the permission; but I would leave the right to any member to object to the introduction of a bill to-day and require it to go over till to-morrow. It amounts to the same thing precisely. Unless somebody does object when I ask leave, the bill is introduced; and if I offer to introduce a bill without asking leave, but still give the right to object, I ask if it is not just the same thing precisely? To save my life I cannot see the difference.

Mr. MERRIMON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. MORTON. Certainly.

Mr. MERRIMON. The Senator rises to introduce a bill, and he does it as a right; he does not ask any permission; he sends it to the table and the Clerk reads the title. After the Clerk has read the title and it goes upon the Journal, another Senator then sees that that is a bill which ought not to be introduced, and then he says, "I object." It goes over then, as he would have us provide; but it goes over after the title of the bill at least has gone upon the Journal.

Mr. MORTON. It amounts to precisely the same thing. If I proposed to introduce a bill now without previous notice, my friend from North Carolina would under no circumstances object unless he knew what the bill was and that it was offensive. He would wait, therefore, until he heard the title read, and then he would say "I object," and thereupon the bill would go over to the next day. But if I have the right to introduce a bill without asking leave formally, after he hears the title read I still leave him the right to object, and it goes over to the next day. The substance of the rule is observed, but we get clear of this idle formality. That is all there is about it.

Mr. MERRIMON. But if he gives notice, and the rule requires him to give notice, and he says "To-morrow I will introduce a bill" for a particular purpose, then I may, if I wish, ascertain that purpose; I may communicate with him; I may learn the scope of his bill; I may learn its nature; I may learn that it is offensive; and then, when to-morrow comes, and he offers to introduce it, so that it shall take its place on the Journal, I submit to the Senate such considerations as induce me to believe that it ought not to be introduced, and thereupon he is not allowed to introduce it; it has no status on the Journal at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana has moved to recommit the resolution, but the motion to postpone indefinitely has precedence. The first question is on the motion to postpone indefinitely.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion to recommit the resolution to the Committee on Rules.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MERRIMON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 221) to refund to the State of North Carolina certain moneys therein named; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 222) to authorize persons of foreign birth who have declared their intention of becoming citizens to be registered as owners or part owners of registered American vessels; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to make one remark in regard to this bill. Under the law as it exists at present, no person except citizens of the United States can be registered as owner or part owner of an American registered vessel. This bill does not propose in any respect to change the naturalization laws. It does propose, however, to so change the existing law that a person who has been a resident of the United States for ten years, and who is of foreign birth, who has filed his declaration of intention to become a citizen, may be registered as owner or part owner of an American vessel. Although it proposes a somewhat radical change in the law, I think the amendment will commend itself to the favorable consideration of the Committee on Commerce. I move the reference of the bill to that committee, and would ask its early consideration by the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 223) granting a pension to Ira Foster, a private in the war of 1812; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KELLY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 224) enabling claimants to lands within the limits of the Territories of New Mexico, Colorado, and Arizona to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 225) granting six hundred and forty acres of land to the widow and heirs of James Sinclair, deceased; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SARGENT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 226) to make persons charged with crimes and offenses competent witnesses in the courts of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 227) for the relief of John M. Dorsey and William Shepeard; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PADDOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 228) to authorize the payment of prize-money to the captors of the steamboat New Era No. 5 and cargo; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 229) to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOGY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 230) to establish a branch of the Mint of the United States at Saint Louis, Missouri; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LOGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 231) for the relief of Heartt, Waite & Dodge; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DORSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 232) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi at Memphis, Tennessee; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 233) amendatory of, and supplementary to, the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1871, and the act supplementary thereto, approved May 2, 1872, and the act entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific Ocean," approved July 27, 1866; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COCKRELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 234) to amend section 4698 of the Revised Statutes of the United States so as to allow a pension of $37 per month to soldiers who have lost both an arm and a leg, in lieu of $24 per month now allowed; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ANTHONY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 4) authorizing Captain Temple and Lieutenant-Commander Whiting, of the Navy, to accept a decoration from the King of the Hawaiian Islands; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

DEATH OF SENATOR JOHNSON.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, upon me devolves the sad duty of formally announcing to the Senate the death of Hon. ANDREW JOHNSON, late a Senator from the State of Tennessee.

On the 31st day of July, 1875, near his mountain home in East Tennessee, surrounded by family and friends, he passed from earth to meet his reward. The event was a shock to the people of the State who had so recently honored him by an election through their representatives to a seat in this body; it was a shock to the nation, whose highest offices he had filled.

The conflicts of party in which he freely mingled are too recent not to have left deep scars; but throughout our mighty Republic everywhere there were those who delighted to do him honor. The greater part of his life was passed in the public service; much of that time in the councils of the nation; and having almost reached his threescore years and ten, the scriptural limit of human life, he has passed the portals of the tomb, been claimed by the insatiate archer, his spirit summoned to God who gave it, and his body consigned to the place appointed for the dead.

He will no more go in and out before us. No more will his voice be heard in this Chamber. No more will expectant friends crowd these galleries, to hang upon his words and catch the inspiration which he was accustomed to impart to them by the fervor of his utterances. Nor will the Senate again be edified or instructed by his exposition of the Constitution, or the enunciation of his opinions, lucid and mature as they always were. Life is ended. The mortal has put on immortality, and what he has accomplished for the good of mankind alone remains to us of this tribune of the people.

Senators, how frequent of late have been these visits of death to this Chamber! Since our separation in March last, once and again, and yet again, has he accomplished his mission, and three of our associates been called from our assemblies here to meet the realities of the future and eternal life. The genial smile and friendly greeting of our honored and revered friend, the late Vice-President, will no more be seen and felt by us. His generous heart has ceased to be affected by earthly woes.

Nor shall we again be permitted to listen to the words of wisdom and instruction with which the late Senator from Connecticut [Mr. FERRY] was accustomed to edify and enlighten the Senate. He, too, has been called to a higher sphere and a nobler work. Well may we exclaim, in the language of the righteous man of Uz, "Have pity upon me, O ye my friends; for the hand of God hath touched me."

Few men have been more prominent or commanded to a greater extent the attention of the people than Mr. JOHNSON.

After his entrance upon public life his career was marked by warm friendships and fierce antagonisms. He courted controversy and shrank not when the contest came. In this and the other House he was reckoned among those who contended for the mastery. He was often in the fiercest of the conflict, and was not wanting in success. During his terms of service he participated in most of the debates which took place upon the questions then agitated in Congress. He also engaged as a public speaker before the people in all the canvasses which were waged after he became a public man. Few speakers excelled him in depth of conviction or in earnestness of utterance. He exercised in an eminent degree the faculty of attracting the attention of his hearers and retaining it with unflagging interest to the end. Many of his speeches have been preserved, but will fail to give to those who may read them in the future an adequate idea of their power upon those who heard them.

His state papers while President will be the most lasting monument of his claim to greatness as a statesman. Many of them are productions which have seldom, if ever, been excelled.

But this is neither a suitable nor proper occasion to pass them in review, or to discuss their merits, or to compare them with the productions of others, or to speak of the principles advocated. All this belongs to those who may come after us, to those who will write history, and who will assign each contestant for the world's honor his proper niche in the temple of fame.

Mr. JOHNSON was conspicuous in every position in which he was placed. Whether in the halls of legislation or in the executive departments of government he commanded attention. Whether as governor, directing the affairs of a single State, or in the presidential chair, superintending the affairs of this great nation, the mass of his countrymen award him the highest praise and insist that his conduct will bear favorable comparison with the purest and best of those who preceded him in office.

His aim in the discharge of the high duties devolving upon him in his exalted office, so far as we can know it from official action, was to know the Constitution and to follow it. A firm believer himself in the capacity of man for self-government, and that our form of government furnished the best model that has ever been devised for proving the truth of the theory, he sought earnestly to carry into practice its every precept. In his opinion the people may always be trusted to do right. They will never do wrong intentionally. And if they do err, it will be through the influence of trusted leaders, and but momentarily; "their second sober thought" will always bring them back to the path of safety, rectitude, and progress. To them he confidently looked for the remedy of any fault which might be developed in the working of our system of government. He trusted the people implicitly, and never doubted that they would see and prevent any subversion of their liberties or restraint of their rights and privileges.

He was indeed a tribune of the people. In his care their dearest rights and interests were secure, so far as intentional injury upon his part was concerned. He was one of the people, felt for them, sympathized with them, and they believed was ready to do all in his power for their political advancement. Hence the devotion of the masses for him. The theater of his power and greatness was before the masses. He swayed them by the earnestness of his eloquence and the conviction which he aroused in them of the sincerity of his beliefs and purposes. Few men have shown greater power in arousing the people and attaching them to their fortunes than did Mr. JOHNSON. The secret lay in his own firm convictions and his unwavering belief in the patriotism, good sense, and integrity of the masses, that they desired to do right and would do so in the end, together with the faculty, which he possessed in an eminent degree, of impressing the truthfulness of these convictions upon his hearers. But why should I dwell upon that which is so familiar to all who knew him; and who is there to whom he was unknown?

His public life is known to all the people. The most trying scenes in it are of too recent occurrence and too important in their effects upon the nation to be easily forgotten. I will not enter upon the vain task of attempting to add anything to his fame. In this place, where he was so well known, amid those many of whom were actors in the most important event of his eventful life, why portray the past? Why dwell upon his merit, which will now be so readily admitted?

But he will no more be seen among us. He has been called to meet the Judge of all the earth. The places which knew him here will know him no more forever. Another has been called to fill his vacant chair and charged with the performance of the duties which so recently devolved upon him. "Alas, how soon we are forgotten" is a truth felt by all who have lived to man's estate. Yet there are some the memory of whose deeds will long survive and whose names the world will not willingly forget. May we not hope that our lamented colleague will be one in this roll of honor. Death has purified his fame. His faults will be forgotten and his virtues cherished. In this spirit I lay my wreath upon his tomb.

Mr. President, I offer for present consideration the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has received with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. ANDREW JOHNSON, late a Senator of the United States from the State of Tennessee.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect for the memory of Mr. JOHNSON, the members of the Senate will go into mourning by wearing crape upon the left arm for thirty days.

Resolved, That, as an additional mark of respect for the memory of Mr. JOHNSON, the Senate do now adjourn.

Ordered, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, as a member of this body, in the discharge of what I regarded as a high official duty, I voted for the impeachment of ANDREW JOHNSON. I believed he had violated the law; and for that vote I have no excuse or apology to offer; but, sir, I would let the memory of what I regarded as his faults be buried with him, and choose to remember only his virtues and his services to his country. I would exercise for him the same charity that I would ask to have extended to myself in the inevitable hour.

Mr. JOHNSON was a man of remarkable traits of character. He was distinguished for his tenacity of purpose, perhaps for his impatience of opposition. He was combative in his temperament; and that quality of his mind, I have no doubt, led him to do many of those things to which objection was taken. He was born in the humble walks of life; he lived in poverty, and had no advantages of early education. I have heard it said that his wife taught him to read. But he was distinguished for his thirst for knowledge and for an honorable ambition, and he went up step by step; first, holding an office in the town in which he lived, and afterward in the Legislature of Tennessee; then a member of the other House of Congress, and then a member of this body. In every position in life he showed himself to be a man of ability and of courage, and I believe it is proper to say of ANDREW JOHNSON that his honesty has never been suspected: the smell of corruption was never upon his garments.

As a member of this body, in 1858 he introduced a bill granting a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of land to every actual settler. He was far in advance of the statesmen of his own section, and even of those of the North, upon that question. It was a measure that was not popular in the South, for reasons which we can all understand, but which it is not necessary to advert to now. That measure did not become a law then, though it did afterward; but Mr. JOHNSON was entitled to none the less credit for his early and bold advocacy of it. The establishment of the homestead was almost an era in the history of this country. It was one of the greatest blessings that was ever conferred by a single act of Congress.

When the storm of secession swept over the South and through this Hall, ANDREW JOHNSON was the only member of Congress from the South in either House, so far as I remember, who resisted that wave and stood faithfully to the Union. In introducing this matter, of course I desire to arouse no partisan feeling here, but simply to do justice to his history. It cost something to be a Union man in the South. These southern Senators can testify to that. It required courage and daring that were not required to take a similar position in the North. Mr. JOHNSON understood full well that it would cost him the friendship of his life-long neighbors in Tennessee; that it would, at least for a time, make him an outcast from their society; that he might even become an exile from the State in which he had lived and which he had so long and so ably served; but he stood in this Chamber and declared his devotion to the Union, turned his back upon those seductive influences to go with the South in that terrible controversy, defied their threats, hurled back with indignation the epithets that had been launched upon him. He made a speech here on the 5th and 6th days of February, 1861, which I have taken the pains to hunt up. I remember the effect of those words as they rang through the North. In the course of that speech Mr. JOHNSON said:

Sir, I intend to stand by that flag, and by the Union of which it is the emblem. I agree with Mr. A. H. Stephens, of Georgia, "that this Government of our fathers, with all its defects, comes nearer the objects of all good governments than any other on the face of the earth."

And again he said:

I have been told, and I have heard it repeated, that this Union is gone. It has been said in this Chamber that it is in the cold sweat of death; that, in fact, it is really dead, and merely lying in state waiting for the funeral obsequies to be performed. If this be so, and the war that has been made upon me in consequence of advocating the Constitution and the Union is to result in my overthrow and in my destruction, and that flag, that glorious flag, the emblem of the Union, which was borne by Washington through a seven years' struggle, shall be struck from the Capitol and trailed in the dust; when this Union is interred, I want no more honorable winding-sheet than that brave old flag and no more glorious grave than to be interred in the tomb of the Union.

Those were brave words to be uttered by ANDREW JOHNSON under the circumstances. I admired and honored him at the time; I do so now, and ever shall. He was a brave man, and he encountered risks and subjected himself to dangers which we of the North scarcely knew anything about. Perhaps no man in Congress exerted the same influence on the public sentiment of the North at the beginning of the war as ANDREW JOHNSON.

Afterward, in the spring of 1862, I think it was in March, Mr. Lincoln appointed him military governor of the State of Tennessee. He went there at the imminent risk of his life. He was subjected to violence, I think at Lynchburgh, on the road; and when he arrived at Nashville he was threatened with assassination on the streets and in public assemblies; but he went on the streets; he defied those dangers; he went into public assemblies, and on one occasion went into a public meeting, drew his pistol, laid it on the desk before him, and said: "I have been told that I should be assassinated if I came here. If that is to be done, then it is the first business in order, and let that be attended to." No attempt having been made, he said: "I conclude the danger has passed by;" and then he proceeded to make his speech. His conduct as military governor was distinguished for courage, for devotion to the interests of the Union; and the admiration created by his conduct throughout the North led to his nomination for Vice-President upon the republican ticket in 1864. He was elected, and afterward became President of the United States by the assassination of Mr. Lincoln.

We were personal friends. The first time I met Mr. JOHNSON was in this Chamber. I was on a casual visit here, and heard the debate in which Mr. Breckinridge made his final speech before leaving to join the confederate army. I was introduced to Mr. JOHNSON then, and from that time we were friends. After I had voted for his impeachment, and met him accidentally, he wore the same kindly smile as in times before, and offered me his hand. I thought it showed nobility of soul. There were not many men who could have done that.

He has gone! We are all soon to follow him. If he had his faults, let them be buried with him. Let us remember the great services he rendered to his country. He was faithful to his country in a time of great trial, and let that fidelity and those great services always be remembered.

Mr. MCCREERY. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] introduced his remarks by a reference to the impeachment trial. I will say that I had the honor to be one of the Senators who voted for acquittal on that occasion. Like him, I have no apologies to make for that vote.

Death has stricken a great name from the roll of the Senate. The providence of God is over us, and we bow reverently to the dispensation, even though the bonds of brotherhood are broken. The mortal remains of ANDREW JOHNSON lie buried under the soil of Tennessee. His record as a statesman is finished. His career, with its toils, its struggles, and its anxieties is completed. We turn for a few moments from the discharge of our ordinary duties to make this last sad offering to the memory of that extraordinary man, and his name and his fame are ready for history. He was plain and simple in his manners and tastes, and if it were posssible for him to exert a controlling influence over the solemn exercises of this hour, he would prefer the words of soberness and truth to the exaggeration and extravagance of eulogy. In the walks of private life he was considered a good citizen. He spoke the truth, paid his taxes, settled his just debts; he was an honest man. So well was he established in that regard, that where he was best known his bitterest enemy would resent even an insinuation that he had been guilty of duplicity, falsehood, or fraud in any of his business transactions. Senator Brownlow has never been conspicuous for moderation in controversy, neither has he been extravagant, but, on the contrary, exceedingly economical and frugal in the use of compliment toward his adversaries; but that Senator, in the long years of their fierce antagonism, not only never assailed, but he never failed on proper occasion, before or after the death of JOHNSON, to vindicate his integrity. Integrity was the foundation upon which he reared the superstructure of his political fortune. He enjoyed more of the confidence and respect than he did of the personal regard and esteem of his fellow-citizens. He had not the dash which sometimes elevates an empty-headed demagogue to great popularity, which leaves him as suddenly and perhaps as unexpectedly as it was acquired. He wore a sad expression, and his conversation was neither witty nor brilliant, but direct and to the point. If it possessed any charm, it was due in a measure to the modulations of a clear, mellow voice, the tones of which rose and fell as passion, interest, or indifference predominated at the moment. These, however, were not even elements of his strength. The people believed he was honest, they knew he was capable, and that was enough for them.

If the departed Senator belonged to any church, it must have been to the church militant, for life with him was a warfare from beginning to end. He was aggressive, unyielding, uncompromising. When smitten, he forgot the injunction and smote the smiter, and the battle was measured by resource and endurance. Christian or Moslem stood by the symbol of his faith with no more tenacity and resolution than he displayed in defense of his principles. He enjoyed triumph with moderation, but it cannot be said that he bore defeat with true philosophy. If he had reflected that position was as desirable to others as to himself, it might have turned the edge of his resentment. The champion of popular rights had little respect even for a popular verdict adverse to himself, and a new trial and a re-argument of the cause were demanded.

Justice to ANDREW JOHNSON requires at least an allusion to his humble origin, to his early orphanage, and to his poverty at the outset of life. He had learned the trade of a tailor, and the work on the board might be said to constitute the boundary of his useful knowledge. But an angel had taken her place by his side to share his joys and his sorrows, and to cheer and to bless and to enlighten him by her counsel and instruction. He labored diligently for her support, and she more than canceled the obligation by gently dispelling the dark shadows and imparting light and life and energy to his understanding. She prepared him to stand forth in the stature and strength of manhood, and to discharge the highest and most responsible duties of an American citizen. He was not the creature of accident nor the offspring of chance, but a self-reliant man, of steady purpose and iron will, who started from the bottom, and from a village alderman rose rapidly through the different grades of the public service to the most exalted position upon earth. After a few years of private life he was returned by his State to the Senate under circumstances peculiar in some respects. He was the first ex-President who had entered the Senate, and it was understood that he acknowledged no special fealty and no particular partiality to any political organization. Much was expected from him. Whether the highest hopes and expectations of his friends and admirers would have been realized or not is a matter of conjecture concerning which every man will enjoy his own opinion.

I never heard a speech from him until a short time before our final separation. That speech was published as delivered, without revision or correction. Critics may discover redundancy and repetition, but we who heard it know that it was a powerful appeal in behalf of the Constitution. Other speakers may have been as logical and as eloquent, but no man spoke with more earnestness than he did. He related no anecdotes, and aimed at no pleasantries; but voice, manner, and diction rose to the level of the great question he was considering, and Senate and galleries listened with profound attention. The unvarying earnestness of his delivery may have been the secret of his power and the key to his strong hold upon the confidence of the people of Tennessee. But speculation is idle; we only know that from a most unpromising beginning he accomplished surprising and wonderful results. When he went to Greeneville he was a stranger, and a tailor's "kit," his thimbles and his needles, were probably the sum-total of his earthly possessions; at his death, the hills and the valleys and the mountains and the rivers sent forth their thousands to testify to the general grief at the irreparable loss.

I honor him for that manly courage which sustained him on every occasion, and which never quailed in presence of opposition, no matter how imposing. I honor him for that independence of soul which had no scorn for the lowly and no cringing adulation for the exalted. I honor him for that sterling integrity which was beyond the reach of temptation, and which, at the close of his public service, left no blot, no stain upon his escutcheon. I honor him for that magnanimity which, after the war cloud had passed and the elements had settled, would have brought every citizen under the radiant arch of the bow of peace and pardon.

It is the province of patriotism to guard the ashes and to cherish and perpetuate the memories of the mighty dead. Every locality has its particular treasures. Jackson, Polk, and JOHNSON! Will these names be forgotten in Tennessee? The sun and the stars will shine in their seasons, but revolving years will neither quench nor dim the light of their great examples.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, it seems to me appropriate that the voice of North Carolina should join in these solemn ceremonies. There our late associate, the late Ex-President JOHNSON, was born, and there he began his remarkable career which rendered him famous in this and other lands. The people of that State watched with more than ordinary interest his eventful life—sometimes approvingly and at others with disapprobation; they recognized his marked ability, his industry and self-reliance, his courage and fortitude, his firmness and integrity, his successes and his triumphs; they condemned his faults, but over them they have cast the mantle of charity and forgetfulness, and they have shared largely and sincerely in the general sorrow occasioned by his sudden death.

My personal acquaintance with Mr. JOHNSON began shortly after I became a member of the Senate; it was brief and agreeable, and served to strengthen my impressions of his character derived from a general knowledge of him for a long while as a prominent public man. He was not only a distinguished citizen, but in many respects he was one of the great men of his country and of the age in which he lived. His cast of mind, his character, and successes in life present an interesting study in connection with our political institutions and their peculiar workings in the development of the talents and virtues of men in every class and condition of society. He did what few have accomplished in the course of time. From a birth, a boyhood, and circumstances the most humble and untoward, without aid and without extraordinary advantages at any period of his life, often under the frowns of the great and powerful, by the exercise of his own powers and his own efforts, he passed gradually, and always with distinction, through stations small and great until he reached and filled with striking ability, and under circumstances the most trying, one of the most exalted on earth.

Without intending here to approve or disapprove his general course of action, if we consider fairly the extraordinary, perilous, and revolutionary circumstances that surrounded the country at the time he filled the high station of President, it may well be doubted whether any of the great men who at different periods filled that place could have ruled and subdued the storm of passion and partisan fury that threatened to ingulf the Government, more successfully than he did. Whatever the unfriendly critic may say, all disinterested men will agree that he filled most of the many stations he occupied with great acceptability, and all of them with great credit to himself. I think it may be fairly said of him that in all the responsible places he filled he never failed to prove himself equal to the duties devolved upon him. Doubtless he did not discharge them acceptably to all; but all must admit that he did so with distinguished ability. For his elevation and distinction he was not indebted to any sudden freak of fortune in arms or civil life, but to his native talents, his efforts, and his persistency in sunshine and storm alike. He lacked the polish of high culture and training, but he possessed in a large degree the moral, intellectual, and physical power to command fortune. This epitome of his life marks him one of the strong and great men of his age.

Mr. JOHNSON possessed a strong, logical, and aggressive mind and a powerful will. He had stern integrity, which he carried into all the relations of life; indeed, this was one of his leading and striking characteristics; he was remarkable for his honesty, and

> To be honest, as this world goes, is to be one man picked out of ten thousand.

His moral and physical courage were unbending, often rising to heroism. The adverse circumstances of his early life deprived him of the essential advantages of youthful education and training, but he overleaped this obstacle; he was self-educated; he had not the finish of systematic culture, nor could he claim great learning, but he thought, wrote, and spoke strongly and intelligently on all subjects that engaged his attention. Some of his state papers will compare favorably with the best. He had an extensive and correct knowledge of human nature and large insight into the motives of men. He measured them at a glance mentally and morally, and generally with singular accuracy. He had administrative capacity of no ordinary mold or measure.

He was always thoroughly and honestly in sympathy with the masses of the people and popular government. He was essentially a man of the people; and however he may sometimes have erred in judgment looking to that end, he zealously desired their welfare and happiness. He made them believe so, and this may be reckoned one of the strongest elements of his power with, before, and over the masses of his fellow-countrymen.

He made mistakes, some of them grave ones; but who is free from error? He had faults; he may have had serious ones; it were strange indeed if, under the conflicts and temptations of his life, he were free from them. And let me ask what man of us is free from them? His virtues and patriotism far outweighed and outmeasured his errors and follies. Let us keep fresh in our memory the former and over the latter let the mantle of charity be cast.

I well remember how, on the 4th of March last, when he entered this Chamber to take his seat again as a member of the Senate, his countrymen, crowding the galleries and corridors, saluted him with loud and spontaneous applause, and how they did a second time, when he stepped forward to be sworn. Admiring, tasteful, and delicate friends had richly adorned his desk with beautiful and expressive flowers, and when that day the Senate adjourned hundreds of his friends, and men, too, who had in the past been unfriendly toward him, hurried to his seat to tender him respect and sincere congratulations. That was a grand occasion for him, and his heart was glad!

He was not an aged man. His friends had hoped that he would be spared to his country many years to come to do much and noble service for that country. But his work is done; his labors are ended. Death suddenly snatched him away from the scenes, the conflicts and sorrows, the pleasures and the honors of this life, and he is gone to try the realities of eternal things. May his countrymen remember and emulate his virtues and his noble deeds.

Mr. PADDOCK. Mr. President, it is with no ordinary diffidence that I arise to address the Senate upon an occasion of so much interest as the present. The fear that I, who have so recently come among you, may commit an offense against the proprieties which should be as a law unto us all in this Chamber, almost overwhelms me. Indeed, sir, so much has already been so appropriately, so eloquently said by my seniors here, whose fame is the very fame of the Republic itself, that my poor words, however fitly spoken, will, I doubt not, be considered presumptuous. But, sir, I am impelled by a sense of duty to the State I have the honor to represent, in part, upon this floor, to briefly express, on the behalf of all the people thereof, of whatever party, sect, or class, the universal sorrow occasioned there by the death of ANDREW JOHNSON. Especially, sir, do I offer here for the memory of the departed Senator the gratitude and the unselfish reverence, homely though it be, of the thousands in my State who to-day occupy farms of broad fertile acres secured to them through the beneficent provisions of the homestead law. They, sir, and the generations that are to come after them, will ever hold in grateful remembrance his manful advocacy of the principles of that law long before its enactment; at a time, sir, when it had few if any friends but himself, and seemingly but little to hope from the future, ANDREW JOHNSON pointed the way; and the republican party, to its honor and its glory be it said, afterward followed therein until this great boon for the homeless and the landless was secured.

Mr. President, I recall to-day a reminiscence of unusual interest to myself, at least. Will you indulge me while I refer to it? On the sixth day of next month fifteen years will have passed since, in company with another gentleman, both of us citizens of the then sparsely-settled Territory of Nebraska, I sat in yonder gallery, electrified by the patriotic eloquence of ANDREW JOHNSON. That, as I remember, was my first visit to this Chamber; certainly his great speech for the Union, delivered upon that occasion, was the first to which I ever listened here. On the 5th day of last March I met ANDREW JOHNSON upon this floor, after his long absence from the Senate. We met here then as Senators-elect, and when, together, we swore to uphold the Constitution of our country, my memory went back over the eventful interval of time that had elapsed, and the patriot statesman, who, alone of all his section, had stood bravely up from out the very ranks of secession on yonder side, and, with firm but tearful utterance, proclaimed his unalterable fealty to the Union and the old flag, was again before me. My companion, too, of the gallery was here; I meet him now as my colleague upon this floor; we were here together to represent a State containing nearly a half million of people, a sovereignty which did not exist when, upon that memorable occasion to which I have adverted, ANDREW JOHNSON denounced secession and disunion with so much power and vehemence; the rebellion had come and gone, bearing its full fruition of direful consequences, as he did then predict; a river of blood had carried between its full banks, upon a resistless tide, the worn and battered hulk of slavery far into the sea of perdition. The Union was restored, re-invigorated by the rich draughts it had drawn fresh from the fountain of liberty, and the great army of American civilization, with "standards full high advanced," was moving forward to new centenary conquests. That, sir, was a moment of intensest interest to my whole nature for the reflections it induced, as this is one of profoundest sorrow for the memories that, crowding mournfully each upon the other, have taken full possession of us all.

Mr. President, I believe, sir, notwithstanding the fact that a painful chapter of history relating to the official acts of ANDREW JOHNSON was made in this very Chamber, that no Senator here present will refuse to-day to join me in the declaration that he was essentially an honest man; ay, sir, a patriot in the fullest sense of the term. It is true, indeed, sir, that he possessed his full share of the weakness by which human nature, wherever found, in its highest as well as its lowest estate, is always beset. And yet, sir, who among us will undertake to exalt himself above his fellows in respect of his freedom therefrom? Speaking for myself alone I do frankly admit that upon sudden impulse, under great excitement, I have spoken words and performed acts which I would gladly expunge from life's record, and thank my God upon bended knees for the opportunity so to do. Who of you, brother Senators, will say less than this for himself? Who of you will undertake to say more than this of ANDREW JOHNSON?

To-day, sir, the voice of party is hushed, and the war of factions and of policies is forgotten, while, as mourners as of a common brotherhood, we all do pause before the new-made grave of ANDREW JOHNSON to drop the tear of sad remembrance. His ashes now mingle with the soil of the State he loved so well and served so faithfully in the Union he helped to save; but his spirit has gone, with that of WILSON and of FERRY, to unite with those of Lincoln and Seward and the other immortal patriots who went before in that invisible spiritual aggregation, whence we are to draw the inspiration which shall quicken here the development and the growth of a higher, a purer civilization, and a stronger, a nobler nationality. God speed the day, sir, when, by the aid of this inspiring influence, the popular sentiment of our country, as well as its ethics, shall demand of politicians, of statesmen, of parties, and that political power the press the exercise of the broadest and the fullest Christian charity in all their intercourse each toward the other!

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, having held an important position under Mr. JOHNSON while he was President of the United States, I was frequently brought in contact with him, and I had for this reason a good opportunity to form an estimate of his abilities and to study the main characteristics of his mind and the great outlines of his general character. A sense of duty, growing out of this official connection, impels me to say a few words on this occasion. I do this with great diffidence, not only because of my inability to do justice to the subject, but also because I follow other Senators who have spoken with much more eloquence than I pretend to possess.

That our late brother was a remarkable man is a fact which is beyond all doubt, and which no one will contest; indeed, his singularly remarkable career is enough to establish this. In my opinion, it is not extravagant to say that this career has no parallel in history in this or any other country, nor in this or any other age of the world. For, although history has preserved and transmitted to us the names of many men born in obscurity and in the humblest station in life who attained the very highest positions in their country, yet in most instances, if not in every one, these men were thrown up, as it were, by the force of great events with which they were in some way connected, and in most cases these remarkable ascents of men from obscurity to distinction were of military characters. History informs us that several of the emperors of Rome, when it was the mistress of the civilized and barbarian world, were born in slavery. Pizarro, a hog-driver, became the conqueror of Peru, and his name will live in the annals of history forever. And yet it is not difficult to understand the rise of the Roman slave or of the young hog-driver; great events with which they were connected, and which they had the genius to control, made them what they were. But in the case of Mr. JOHNSON his rise from obscurity to distinction through a long gradation of offices and to a seat in this body was the work of his own hands and the legitimate results of his own unaided exertions and great native ability. He was truly the sole architect of his own fortunes. No fortunate or singular circumstances favored his election as alderman of his village nor as mayor, or his election as a member of the Legislature of his State, or to a seat in the House of Representatives of the United States, nor as governor of his State, and finally to a seat in this body as an American Senator. Up to this time it can be truly said that he carved his own fortunes alone and unaided by any adventitious circumstances of any kind. Will, pluck, and ability were the weapons he wielded to accomplish his purposes; and we are informed from his well-known history that he attained the ends which he aimed to accomplish, not by intrigue or cunning, but by a stern and manly course, meeting his opponents and all opposition boldly and defiantly, and so far from attempting to avoid opposition, inviting it. Indeed, his combative temper always brought about very great opposition. This he seemed to enjoy. He loved the excitement of a warm political contest, and for it he was most singularly adapted—a ready debater, quick at repartee, a naturally close reasoner, having a profound knowledge of the heart of the people among whom his lot was cast, ready and able to take advantage of any favorable circumstance which presented itself. He went before the people with views and opinions of his own, advocating them boldly and ably, and was always willing and ready to stand or fall with them, and, although a democrat, very seldom, if ever, in line with his party. He was not a demagogue, but he always presented himself as the friend of the people, and particularly of the poor and humble. That in presenting himself on all occasions as the friend of the poor and humble he was honest and sincere, admits of no doubt. His own humble birth and the circumstances surrounding his early years were enough of themselves to impart to his peculiar nature a feeling of sincere love and sympathy for this portion of his fellow-men. He was one of them, and his sympathy for them was natural. And this sympathy he exhibited during his long political life. Yet this by itself would not be sufficient to account for his extraordinary success.

I said at the outset that my official position while he was President of the United States enabled me to form an estimate of his abilities and of his general character. While his abilities, in my opinion, were not of the very highest order, yet they were very far above the common run of men, and indeed, when his want of early training is considered, they might well be considered as extraordinary. I did not think that his perceptive faculties were very quick, but he possessed great natural power of elaboration and he worked out his conclusions by serious and laborious thinking. He made the impression on me of a great thinker, and was willing to do a great deal of hard work in this way. When his mind was fully made up he was as firm as a rock, and nothing on earth could shake him. It may be that he indeed carried this too far, and he was in consequence of this considered by some as headstrong and stubborn. His moral courage was great, was, indeed, sublime. I well remember that during the darkest period of his life, when he appeared to be abandoned by all, he never expressed a doubt of his final triumph; and that this was not assumed but was really felt was shown by his deportment and bearing. I have reason to believe that his physical courage was as great as his moral. Hence he was truly and essentially a brave man, willing and ready to risk his life and political fortunes to carry out his object; and in my opinion this had much to do in securing his long life of success.

It is said that he never was at school, not even for a day, and that his wife, who survives him, was his first instructor. If this be true, his long and successful career must have been a source of great happiness to her, and she must have shared his great and long-continued honors with most singular satisfaction. That his education was under the circumstances imperfect is easily understood; yet he did much to repair this by very general reading. I had occasion to spend many evenings with him, and I then observed that his reading was pretty extensive, although desultory. To say that his memory was good is not enough. At the time I speak of it was truly remarkable, and, as he had served many years in Congress during the days of Calhoun, Clay, Webster, Benton, Grundy, and many others of the distinguished men of that most brilliant period of our history, he could relate many very interesting events connected with them, some of a political nature, some social, and others anecdotical. On such occasions he was extremely genial and amiable, enjoying a hearty laugh as much as any one I ever knew. He possessed good powers of relating past events or anecdotes. I observed one thing, that in speaking of those great men with whom he had become acquainted in this city during his long congressional career, he did so kindly and respectfully, doing full justice to their abilities and to their motives.

Mr. President, it is singular, but it is true, that he filled every office which a man can fill in this country, municipal, State and Federal, civil and military, judicial, (as mayor,) legislative, and executive, from the lowest to the highest, from alderman of a small village to the governorship of his State, major-general in the Army during the war, and finally Vice-President and President of the United States. The last two offices, however, were not the result, like the others, of his own individual labors. Circumstances growing out of the war had no doubt much to do with his selection as a candidate for the Vice-Presidency, and we all know that a circumstance with which he was in no way connected made him President. But his last election to a seat on this floor as Senator was the work of his own hands, brought about by his own indomitable will and pluck, the reward of a long and terrible contest, continuing for some years, unsuccessful for a time, and appearing to all the world besides himself as utterly hopeless; nevertheless, finally he was triumphant. From what I have learned from those who are familiar with this his last contest, he exhibited more openly his true and peculiar nature than at any other period of his life—which was to fight with all his might and all his ability, asking for no quarter and granting none; and although like bloody Richard now and then unhorsed, still to fight and never surrender until victory perched on his banner. Under all the circumstances connected with his previous life—particularly while he was the Chief Executive of this country—this last triumph must have given him more sincere and deeply felt gratification than any other of his life. He is the only one of the number of distinguished men who have held the office of President who afterward became a member of this body. Even in this his fortune appeared to be singular.

I have thus, Mr. President, in a brief and imperfect manner given an outline of the character of this remarkable man. On an occasion like this, and in this body, criticism would be out of place. One of his acts I condemned; but, I repeat, this is neither the occasion nor the place to indulge in criticism. This belongs to history; and his name will be written on its pages and be transmitted to posterity as one of the remarkable characters of our epoch, and as the most perfect type of our republican institutions. His death at this time I consider a public misfortune, as he occupied a position to render great service to his section of our common country.

Distinguished as he was, great as he was, too, his career is ended, and forever; and we again are reminded of the solemn truth that—

The paths of glory lead but to the grave.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. When the minister of God on the last day of the previous session of this body invoked the Divine protection over each of its assembled members, I well remember, as I looked over this Chamber, how the thought suggested by the prayer of the holy man came to my mind, shall we all ever meet again on this floor? That mental interrogatory has been answered in the negative, for since our last meeting in this Chamber at the previous session it has pleased Divine Providence to remove from his earthly sphere, from his family, his country, and his usefulness, our distinguished brother member, ANDREW JOHNSON.

It would not be proper for me, Mr. President, an inexperienced member of this body and a comparative stranger to the deceased, to attempt anything like an encomium upon his character and services, or to enlarge upon the just tributes of honor and praise which have been bestowed upon him by those Senators around me who are so well qualified by their talents and their knowledge of his worth and achievements to perform that sad service. Nor is it from a vain desire to have it said that my humble voice has been raised in these most melancholy services to genius and integrity, that I presume to address you now. But, sir, I feel that to be silent on this occasion would be to refuse to the heart the agency of the tongue to relieve it from the emotions of sadness and regret with which the loss of our honored companion has filled me. Not that that loss is to me so personal as to create the pangs of common grief or affliction. There was no tender personal tie between us to be broken. There is nothing in my feelings of regret on this occasion to mark them from those ordinary emotions which the loss of any good man would produce, except, sir, the uncommon fervency and depth which the public character of the misfortune has occasioned. I feel, sir, that, situated as the country is and as this Senate is, the loss of Mr. JOHNSON is great, if not irreparable, and that if he could have lived through the period for which he was elected to this body, the country would have derived great benefit from his services.

In a country like ours, sir, there is no safer or surer way to measure the usefulness or value of a public man than by a consideration of the influence and power which he wields over the minds and hearts of the people. Under other systems this influence and power do not produce the same results which they do here. The mysterious councils of despotism seldom consider the temper or the affections of the people; and where the latter take no part in the business of government, except to toil to support its aggressions, there is no field for popular leadership or the operation of that sympathy and influence which we have seen binding the people of this country to their rulers with more than despotic force. It has fallen to the lot, sir, of but few men even in this country to command for any great length of time the pure and unselfish love of the people. Great talents and attainments have always exercised, as they should do, a proper influence over the minds of our citizens, and have ever received the highest favors that the people could bestow. But, sir, in all the tributes and honors bestowed upon the many great intellects of the country, there was very little evidence of affectionate attachment or heartfelt devotion on the part of the people.

But it was not the only merit of Mr. JOHNSON that his mind was distinguished for those qualities which ranked him with men of eminence. Gifted as he was in this respect, he had also that which all men of eminence aim to acquire and but few possess, the power to command and the virtue to merit the love and respect of the people. When we contemplate the career of this wonderful man, commencing at the lowest and rising to the highest stratum of society, by means, and by means only, of his own untiring will and talents, it should afford us great satisfaction and pride to have even this example (if it were all, which it is not) of the good effect of our system of government in opening up to the whole people all the honors and emoluments of the State.

In reviewing the tedious and slow progress of governmental reform, with its relapses and conflicts, sometimes attended with tears and blood and at others breaking down the barriers of time and prejudice with the force of truth and reason, there are no facts which appear more striking in the long march of improvement than the tenacity, the mistrust, and jealousy which were ever exhibited by the enemies of the people in their efforts to withhold from society all interest and influence in its own government.

You cannot but remember the terrible conflict so long maintained at Rome for exclusive privileges by the patricians, and the despair and apprehension with which they ultimately yielded to their fellow-citizens a voice in the management of public affairs. It seems to have been claimed at the very dawn of civilization that the imperfect constitution of man would never be made to harmonize with the principles of regular government, unless the persons who administered it could succeed in deluding the people by a show of authority emanating from some mysterious or divine source. And those grand epochs in the history of human liberty, so often pointed to with pride, only attest the slavery and degradation which surrounded those champions of freedom who looked for the foundation of their rights and privileges in the concessions and charters of kings.

Melancholy and sad as this occasion is, it brings to our minds in the most vivid light the true genius of our own free institutions. The grand figure which surmounts this Capitol may be the work of some man whose conceptions of liberty were inspired by the surroundings of despotism. Nothing attests the purity and correctness of imagination more than those pictures of art which are drawn with fidelity by one who has never seen the originals. But still they are only pictures. In the life and character and services of him we mourn to-day we have more than a picture. We see reflected before us not the "watery," but the full and living "image" of a free constitution.

It was quite natural for Mr. JOHNSON to feel more than an ordinary attachment for the Union and Constitution of these States. That he did entertain the most sincere devotion for the principles of this Government no one the least disposed to fairness can deny. He felt too strongly the benefits it conferred to be willing to risk its advantages for any other system, and with an honesty and sincerity which commanded even the respect of his foes he clung to it through all its fortunes. If he favored those measures of war which were adopted by the North when war was a real issue, he also favored the cultivation of kindly sentiments toward the South, when it was not popular to sympathize with that war-wasted section. In the unhappy condition of the southern people, this man of bitter prejudices and strong hatred found abundant opportunity to display the bad passions which were said to have possessed him. But, sir, history does not show, Christian charity and meekness the world over do not exhibit, an instance of greater fidelity to principle, a more sublime example of self-abnegation, or a more complete disregard of all selfish interests, than were made manifest in the humane policy of ANDREW JOHNSON toward the South at a time when he had it in his power to oppress her people.

What motives, think you, prompted him to rise, as he did rise, far above the current of sectional hate and prejudice which for years had carried upon their surface the brightest minds and purest hearts in the country? As a southern man, he was true to the Union; as a lover of the Union, he was true to the Constitution. In maintaining his consistency, he was frequently misrepresented and oftener misunderstood. While supporting the Government, he was accused of having deserted his section; while supporting the Constitution, he was charged with infidelity to the Union and partiality toward the South. He received alternately the praises and condemnation of both sections, and his efforts to serve the country were applauded or denounced as they met the views or crossed the purposes of contending parties. But, regardless of what was thought or said of him, he followed his own stern convictions of duty, and clung to his opinions with more than an eastern devotion. Among the mountains of Tennessee, imperiled by dangers, he proclaimed his adhesion to the Union. From his high position as President of the United States he had the courage to speak a kind word for the South and recommend moderation toward her people. If he sought popularity, as it is said he did, he could say with Lord Mansfield that it was not the popularity which is run after, but that which follows in the train of duty fearlessly performed.

For a time he seemed to be lost in the obscurity of popular neglect. The great party which had elevated him to the first position in the Government pursued him with a bitterness and hatred not often exhibited toward political foes.

Who would have supposed that the State whose interests and fortunes he was said to have deserted would again honor him with the highest position in her gift? This was indeed a victory; but it was a victory of fairness and candor over prejudice; of truth over error; of intelligence over ignorance; and of principle over policy. The reentry of Mr. JOHNSON into this body was a triumph seldom seen in these degenerate days. I speak not now of the éclat and popular applause which accompanied it; but I speak of the moral grandeur exhibited in the return to public service of a worthy servant of the people, who, because he would not follow his party when he thought it was in error, was saved by the justice of his former enemies from the condemnation of his friends. A very eminent member of this body, who also, to the great loss of the country, lies cold in death, once said on this floor, while speaking on an occasion like this, that in a celebrated town of Italy there was a fine collection of paintings open to public view. Between two of the most attractive pictures in the room was a large vacant space, evidently intended for some noble work of art, but which was shrouded in deep mourning, which none could penetrate. This veiled mystery attracted more attention than all the paintings in view. So let it be with that part of the history of the illustrious deceased which for his own and the sake of his country, we could wish should never be written.

Let us hope, sir, that, while his example of patience, industry, and success may continue forever to illustrate the greatness of his own virtues and encourage the youth of our country to emulate his fame, his, as it is the first, may remain the last case in our annals in which a President of this great Republic ever appeared as a defendant at your bar.

If any additional sanction were needed to bind us to the strict performance of our high duties here, surely the uncertainty of life and the certainty of death, as shown by the sudden departure of our deceased friend, ought to be sufficient warning to us all to profit well by the hours at our command ere we are overtaken by that night wherein no man can labor.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, with the exception of the few weeks of the last special session of the Senate, I had personally no public service in connection with our late associate, ANDREW JOHNSON, of Tennessee; nor had there been at any time intimacy between us, nor had our habits of life been sympathetic. Yet, feeling that his career must be of interest to every American, and his personal qualities and public conduct so full of what was useful to the country and honorable to himself, I have to-day a sad pleasure in bearing testimony above his bier to his worth, and in recalling to his surviving countrymen some of the true lessons of his life, although, perhaps, the full and interesting remarks to which we have listened may make mine superfluous. His career notably illustrated a just and generous feature in our institutions. I mean that very essence of freedom, "freedom of opportunities," that "fair field and no favor," upon which every American youth starts in the race of life for success in any profession, for wealth, for fame, for political position and power. In other and less favored lands, of "just and old renown" there is what the poet has well termed the "invidious bar" of humble and obscure birth, which obstructs the timid and inexperienced youth as with unpracticed step he enters upon the rough path of life, and sometimes embarrasses him sadly even to his journey's end. Happily in America this does not exist. Nay, may it not rather be doubted whether the repute of superior fortune and social position is not a weight in the race for popular favor, subjecting their possessor to detraction at the hands of the inconsiderate many?

The man of whom we now speak in his youth was poor, unlettered, and obscure. He had native vigor of mind and body, and the unfettered opportunity afforded by our institutions of government to test freely his capacities in any direction he saw fit. His necessities compelled him to seek employment as a mechanic, and by the labor of his hands he earned his bread; but in all those years of toil he omitted no opportunity or effort to supply the deficiencies in his early education and mental culture. He presented himself as a candidate for public station, and by the suffrages of his fellow-citizens he rose step by step until he became a member of the co-ordinate House of Congress, then of this body, and afterward its presiding officer; then by an event whose dreadful tragedy shocked the whole country he became President of the United States.

We live too near the times in which his official action became so important in its influences upon the country to attempt its history. He came to power and place in a stormy period, the excitements of which have not yet entirely subsided, and the serenity and judicial calmness that should mark the page of history will be those of a future generation, whose pulses never thrilled on one side or the other with the passions of the times in which he lived and died.

But part of his life and example may now be properly examined, and examined only to be approved. Friend and foe alike must admit his steady, unshaken love of country; his constant industry; his simple integrity and honesty; his courage of conviction, that never faltered. All these are worthy examples for the emulation of American youth and the youth of all lands. These home-bred virtues induced a life of simplicity and thoughtful economy; kept his hand clean from even the suspicion of improper gain, and in a long public career preserved him from the many temptations that so often warp men of strong passions and vigorous character like his from the path of duty. He possessed and cherished the fine old-fashioned sense of propriety that prevented his acceptance of gifts from any source or of any nature during his tenure of high official power and patronage, even though proffered in the guise of warm personal and patriotic friendship. His performance of public and official duties was marked by industry and constant care.

Qualities and habits such as these surely are entitled to thankful recognition, and being admirable and wholesome, are always examples needed by a people; by none more than those living under a republican form of government; never more than in the times in which we live.

ANDREW JOHNSON'S rise and success in life will ever be an encouragement and incentive to the poor and friendless among his countrymen to cultivate their intellectual faculties; to neglect no opportunity for the best and most important education—self-education; to be industrious and frugal, that they may be, and continue to be, honest men; to avoid those extravagant modes of living which create temptations so difficult to resist; to be steadfast in adversity, and ever faithful to the government which protects them.

Such habits and qualities will almost certainly bring success; but if not success, then something far better and higher than success—self-respect and the respect and esteem of their fellow-men, the consciousness of duty fulfilled to themselves and their country, whose best hopes largely depend upon the formation of such habits and in the exercise of such virtues by its public men.

Mr. KEY. Mr. President, ANDREW JOHNSON was a very remarkable man. The qualities of his mind and disposition were so unique and peculiar as to lead those acquainted with him to entertain different opinions as to their composition and tendencies.

As is well known, Mr. JOHNSON'S birth was in the midst of poverty and obscurity. His father died when Andrew was but four years old. The son never passed a day in school. At the age of ten years he was apprenticed to a tailor. This species of servitude galled the spirit of the proud boy, and he escaped from it by flight. Unable subsequently to come to terms with his master, he left North Carolina, the State of his nativity, and, crossing its mountains, came to East Tennessee, then a sort of terra incognita. In September, 1826, in his eighteenth year, Mr. JOHNSON arrived at Greeneville, Tennessee, accompanied by his mother. An old wooden cart, drawn by a worthless horse, carried all their wordly goods. He could scarcely read and could not write. Unpromising as the prospect appeared, this youth was destined to address listening Senates, to preside over the destinies of the grandest and greatest Republic the world has ever seen, at a most critical period of its history, and to send his name and fame to the farthest limits of civilization.

Born and reared under the most adverse circumstances, it was not possible that the features and general contour of his mind should be shaped in complete harmony or perfect regularity. Something of ruggedness and angularity of mental, moral, and social characteristics must result from such surroundings as encompassed his early life. His poverty and want of education fettered a bold and ambitious spirit, capable of the highest aspirations. The very unequal distribution of advantages doubtless appeared to him in the aspect of a wrong. A restless and longing mind, shackled and imprisoned, is not apt to be always reasonable and just when it discovers, in the pathway through which its aspirations lead, obstacles which seem to be insurmountable, and beholds beyond them those who have been favored by fortune.

Mr. JOHNSON'S associations from his birth to his manhood were with the poor and unlearned. Rising thence by his unaided exertions, he was under no obligation to those who had moved in a sphere superior to his, and felt none. His sympathies were and they remained with the class of society in which he had been trained. He had not in youth fallen under the refining influences which do so much to soften, enlarge, and diversify man's habitudes and tendencies. His prejudices in favor of the feebler ranks of population became a mental habit before he was able to raise himself into more liberal and enlightened companionship. Of this kinship with the humble he was never ashamed, but it produced in him a distrust of the leaders of society and parties, and led him to the utterance of sentiments on some occasions which were charged to be agrarian in tendency and caused many to allege that he was a demagogue. Mr. JOHNSON was neither an agrarian nor a demagogue. He never put his trust in princes or courted the favor of party leaders, nor was he loved by them. His whole life was a scene of conflict and his triumphs were in spite of leaders. His faith was in the people. Them he loved and trusted. He reposed upon their honor, honesty, patriotism, and virtue. His tribunal of last resort was the people, and to them he appealed. When parties and platforms displeased him he turned his back upon them and rallied his countrymen around him. They loved him, and whether he followed party or not they followed him in multitudes.

On the day of his funeral, if one had stood by the grave of our late President, and had seen the procession which came to it with the body of the dead statesman, among the thousands there he would have discovered not many of earth's great ones; not many in office; no display of "pomp and circumstance." A plain hearse carried the remains of the great dead. Two or three carriages held the members of his family. In that vast procession there was no other vehicle. But the people whom Mr. JOHNSON had loved were there. They had gathered from the fields and workshops, from the mountains and the valleys, their faces browned by the sun and their hands hardened by toil. They had all come; the old, those of middle age, the youthful, and the children. There was none of the pageantry and display which usually follow earth's great ones to sepulture, but in their stead were sad faces and tears, such as go only with loved ones to the tomb. In the solemnity of that hour the mountains, which had stood the sentinels of Mr. JOHNSON'S home and now look down upon his sepulcher, seemed to join in the general sorrow.

In the beginning of our recent civil struggle Mr. JOHNSON'S influence, courage, and activity contributed most powerfully to carry with him a majority of the people of his section of the State in favor of the Federal Union. The authorities of his State, with armies to enforce obedience, were against him, and he had no support at hand but his unarmed and undisciplined multitude; still, unintimidated by threats and unawed by danger, he held aloft the banner of the Union and appealed to the people to uphold it. We know something of the fearful animosities engendered in a community divided in civil war; how the passions are turned loose to deeds of horror at which the blood freezes. Power is used with a remorseless hand, and he who stands in its way is in constant peril.

It was from such a condition of affairs as this, with its hate, revenge, and scenes of blood fresh in his mind, that Mr. JOHNSON entered the presidential chair. I remember well the alarm of the people of the South when the sad news was borne to them of President Lincoln's assassination. Mr. JOHNSON'S denunciations of those who had opposed the Federal Government, and the punishment and penalties he had invoked and threatened, justified the gravest apprehensions. But when he came to be President; when his enemies had laid down their arms and furled their flag, and after the power to pardon as well as to punish had passed into his hands, satisfied, as he must have been, that the great mass of the southern people had been honest, though mistaken, as he believed, in the motives which had impelled their action, all his bitterness and acrimony toward them were dissipated. The man sank himself out of sight, and the President of a powerful nation shielded his late foes by his clemency, though the liberal policy he exercised toward them contributed powerfully to lose him the support of the party which had placed him in office. He who could exercise such magnanimity under such circumstances had a great heart and unflinching fortitude. Those who think Mr. JOHNSON was cold and very selfish never understood his inner nature.

In many respects he was strange and peculiar, so that it is no matter of surprise that many who did not fully comprehend him had an unfavorable estimate of some of the qualities of his mind and heart. He was combative and always armed and equipped for the fray. He did not wait to be assailed, but was usually the first to enter the lists, and no matter how great the odds against him, or how formidable the antagonist, he was eager for the contest. He was also aggressive. He chose to carry the war into the enemy's territory, and it was hard to drive him to a defensive attitude; nor would he leave the field until he had won a complete victory or had suffered a decisive defeat. His life was a contest, and his love of fight sometimes precipitated him into controversies which had been better avoided. He was fearless, self-reliant, and bold, and never bent "the pregnant hinges of the knee where thrift may follow fawning."

Mr. JOHNSON was an honest man. He was never accused of duplicity or unfair dealing. His errors resulted from his convictions of right. Though for forty years he was in the public service, and often in situations in which gratuities and bribes might have been accepted or public funds appropriated with little fear of detection, yet no stain of official corruption had soiled his hands or life. Frugality was a habit with him, and yet out of his salaries in public life he saved only a fair competence.

There were two central ideas around which all his political views revolved and to which his actions were subordinated. He regarded the Constitution, State and Federal, with a veneration and devotion of kin to fanaticism. He appealed to the Constitution on all occasions and under all circumstances, was constantly in apprehension of its violation, and everywhere held it up before the assemblies and tribunals of the nation and, demanded that every jot and tittle of it be observed. With him it was the ark of our safety, as sacred and privileged as was that ark of Israel which could not be touched by profane hands. No measure, howsoever great in its expediency or utility, could receive his support or sanction unless it had certain warrant in the Constitution. His other grand idea was confidence in the people and a strict regard for the protection and security of their interests and the preservation of their liberties. Amplify his theory as he might, these ideas composed its substance. He feared the encroachments of the Government upon the rights of the people. The times of the Cæsars, when the Republic of Rome was transformed into an empire, and of the Charleses of England, when the prerogatives of the crown were extended and enlarged at the expense of the liberties of the people, were with him favorite fields of history, which he carefully explored and often referred to as exhibiting the dangers which threaten a civilized free government.

Mr. JOHNSON'S skill was not so much in construction as in resistance to the schemes and measures of others. His great desire and aim were to maintain and preserve what our fathers had handed down to us. He was afraid that change might mar their work.

Mr. JOHNSON will be a marvel in history. His ascent from the lowest station in society, without adventitious aids or fortunate accidents, and with surroundings the most unpromising, to the grand elevation he attained, cannot be understood and appreciated in any land but ours, and it is an astonishing consummation in it, furnishing splendid evidence of the value, power, and glory of our institutions. He will be held up to the ages to come as an illustrious example of what the poorest and obscurest boy may accomplish if he but have perseverance, pluck, and capacity. Another shining example of this class is found in him who so lately, Mr. President, filled with so much distinction the chair in which you sit to-day.

Mr. JOHNSON has gone from this presence and this Chamber, and will return no more. The "insatiate archer" has no respect for persons, station, or rank. The king and the peasant, the President and the beggar alike become his victims; but, among all the country's dead, this Government has never lost, and never will lose, a more loyal and fearless defender or its people a more devoted friend than ANDREW JOHNSON.

The resolutions were adopted unanimously, and the Senate (at two o'clock and thirty-eight minutes p. m.) adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 11, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ADMISSION TO THE FLOOR.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order. I ask that rule 134 be read.

The SPEAKER. It is very desirable that this rule should be heard, not alone by members, but also by persons inside the Hall who are not members.

The Clerk read as follows:

134. No person except members of the Senate, their Secretary, heads of Departments, the President's private secretary, foreign ministers, the governor for the time being of any State, Senators and Representatives elect, judges of the Supreme Court of the United States and of the Court of Claims, and such persons as have by name received the thanks of Congress, shall be admitted within the Hall of the House of Representatives, or any of the rooms upon the same floor or leading into the same; provided that ex-members of Congress who are not interested in any claim pending before Congress, and shall so register themselves, may also be admitted within the Hall of the House; and no persons except those herein specified shall at any time be admitted to the floor of the House.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 810) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. I move that this bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, ordered to be printed, and made a special order for Thursday morning next, after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to reserve all points of order on the bill.

The motion of Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey, was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMISSIONERS OF CLAIMS.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, from the Committee on Printing, presented the following report; which was ordered to be printed and laid on the table:

The Committee on Printing, having had under consideration a resolution providing for the printing of two thousand extra copies of the index and summary of the reports of the commissioners of claims in cases reported to Congress as disallowed for the use of the House and five thousand copies for the use of the commissioners of claims, respectfully report that, after considering the cost of printing and binding, it is the opinion of the committee that said extra copies be not ordered.

COMMITTEE CLERKS.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I present a report from the Committee on Accounts on a subject referred to that committee. I ask that the report may be considered at this time and adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the following resolution—

Resolved, That the Committee on Accounts report at an early day what committees of the House shall have authority to employ clerks—

—having considered the same, make the following report:

That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812 and Invalid Pensions be allowed one clerk jointly; Committee on Agriculture and the Committee on Manufactures one jointly; Committee on Elections one. Committee on Accounts one: Committee on Territories one; Committee on Commerce one; Committee on the District of Columbia one; Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads one; Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department one; Committee on Indian Affairs and Mines and Mining one; Committee on Military Affairs one; Committee on Education and Labor and Committee on Private Lands Claims one jointly; Committee on the Revision of the Laws of the United States one; Committee on Banking and Currency one; Committee on Patents one; Committee on Judiciary one; Committee on Foreign Affairs one; Committee on Pacific Railroad and Railways and Canals one jointly; Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and Expenditures of the Treasury and War Departments one jointly.

And the compensation shall be fixed as follows:

Committee on Elections, $5 per day; Committee on Banking and Currency, $5; Committee on Pacific Railroad and Railways and Canals, $4; Committee on Commerce, $5; Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, $4; Committee on Manufactures and Agriculture, $4; Committee on Indian Affairs and Mines and Mining, $4; Committee on Military Affairs, $5; Committee on District of Columbia, $4; Committee on Judiciary, $4; Committee on Private Land Claims and Education and Labor, $4; Committee on Naval Affairs, $4; Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department, $5; Committee on Foreign Affairs, $5; Committee on Territories, $4; Committee on War of 1812 and Invalid Pensions, $5; Committee on Revision of Laws, $5; Committee on Patents, $4; Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and the Expenditures of the Treasury and War Departments, $5; Committee on Accounts, $5.

Respectfully submitted,

J. D. WILLIAMS,
Chairman Committee on Accounts.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman who submits this report be good enough to state how many additional clerks this resolution authorizes; how many more than are customary?

Mr. RANDALL. I was about to ask what is the reduction which this resolution proposes in the number of clerks.

Mr. KASSON. The same information will be obtained in either form.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. This report provides for twenty clerks in addition to the five provided for by law.

Mr. KASSON. Making twenty-five in all?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. Yes, sir.

Mr. KASSON. How many were there in the last Congress?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. In the last Congress I believe there were thirty-five—thirty receiving per diem pay and five provided for by the general appropriation bill; six perhaps.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana whether in this report the Committee on Accounts has followed the law in regard to the pay to be allowed clerks of committees?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. We have kept within the law which intended that the per diem allowance to clerks of committees should not in any case go beyond $6. In this report from the Committee on Accounts now before the House we have not allowed the clerk of any committee higher than $5 a day.

Mr. GARFIELD. In this connection let me say in addition that for many years there has been a difference in the pay of the clerks to committees in the two Houses, which has worked injustice to the clerks of committees in this House. Each House being allowed to fix the pay of its own clerks to committees, we found the other branch of Congress paying their clerks some two or three dollars a day more than the clerks received in this House for precisely similar services. Therefore, last winter, in one of the appropriation bills—I think in the legislative appropriation bill—there was a limit fixed beyond which the pay of clerks to committees in the Senate or the House should not go. I hope that has not been overpassed in any case, because, if it has, it will be followed on the other side of the Capitol.

Mr. RANDALL. I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that these clerks to committees are paid out of the contingent fund of the respective Houses, and therefore we have no mode of reaching the clerks of the Senate except by a general law fixing the maximum pay. We have not any control, except as the gentleman from Indiana has indicated.

This is, in fact, Mr. Speaker, a reduction of ten clerks to committees from the number allowed in the last House, while, in addition, it provides for the reduction of the per diem allowed to these clerks.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman from Indiana state whether we ever before had a clerk for the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department?

Mr. RANDALL. As I understand the report of the gentleman from Indiana, there have been consolidations and re-arrangements of these committee clerks.

Mr. KASSON. But I should like to know whether we ever before have had any clerks to committees on expenditures in the Executive Departments?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. You will find that a clerk was allowed to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads last year. I understand the per diem allowance was $4.80.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman is correct, no doubt, in that regard, but I do not speak of a clerk to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, but whether any clerk has ever before been allowed to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department. I do not know of any clerk ever being allowed to any of these committees on expenditures in the various Executive Departments.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I can say to the gentleman from Iowa that this clerk was allowed $4.80 a day last year.

Mr. KASSON. Does not the gentleman from Indiana confuse the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department with the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I do not.

Mr. KASSON. I think, if the record were examined, it would be found that none of these committees on expenditures in the several Departments were ever allowed clerks.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I wish to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I yield to a question.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I should like to know what propriety there is in only allowing to the clerk to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads $4 a day, while the same report allows to the clerk to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department $5 a day. I have had some experience in this matter, and I know the clerk to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads has ten times more work to do than the clerk to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department can have.

Mr. GUNTER. It ought not to be forgotten that one clerk is provided for in this report to committees jointly.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me say in regard to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department that in the last House of Representatives there was a clerk allowed for a portion of the session, as is shown by the report up to the month of June. Generally, when investigations have been required to be made, a clerk has been deemed necessary for the committee required to make the investigation.

Mr. HOSKINS. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Accounts in the last Congress, and of this Congress, I desire to say a single word on this subject. My attention has not been called directly and distinctly to the point of the number of clerks given to committees in this House during the last Congress, but I will be very much disappointed to find that the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Accounts that thirty-five clerks to committees were appointed during the last Congress could be substantiated by the facts. My recollection is that that statement is not correct. The clerks, so far as I remember, were confined to the number allowed by law by the last Congress. So far as this clerk to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department is concerned, I know one or two of the committees charged with investigation of Departments had a clerk jointly; but, according to my present recollection, no committee having charge of investigation into any one of the Executive Departments had a clerk singly and alone. As to clerks being assigned generally to committees of this character, I am entirely clear that they were not. I ask the gentleman who states that there were thirty-five clerks to committees allowed in the last Congress to give the names of the committees to which clerks were assigned.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. The law provided for clerks for five regular committees, such as the Committees on Ways and Means, Appropriations, War Claims, &c. Those five were provided by law, and I find in addition there were thirty clerks allowed to other committees, making thirty-five clerks in all.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I desire to ask the gentleman who made the report, why he put down the clerk of the Committee on the Judiciary, which is one of the most important committees of the House, having a vast amount of business, at $4 a day, while he places the clerk of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, which has very little business, at $5 a day?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I can only say that that was the action of the committee by a majority.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. The Committee on the Revision of the Laws has no business. The Committee on the Judiciary is full of business. Yet the clerk of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws is to have $5 a day, and the clerk of the Committee on the Judiciary only $4 a day.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I do not object to a reduction in the expenses for clerks of committees, because I am for economy in all respects. But I do object to giving but one clerk to two very important committees. I understand that the number of clerks, as compared with the number during last Congress, has been cut down ten; that whereas the number was then thirty-five, it is now only twenty-five. I desire to say for my own committee, that of Railways and Canals, that we object to being put with the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, so as to have but one clerk for the two committees. We have already conceded to the suggestion of the Speaker that the two committees should occupy but one room. This is as far, I think, as concession ought to go, because even to that extent it will involve serious inconvenience as regards the transaction of the business of these committees. But to give one clerk to these two very important committees is, I think, very unjust, and I hope the chairman of the Committee on Accounts will agree that one shall be given to the Committee on Railways and Canals as well as one to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad; and if he gives to each but $4 a day, I am satisfied with that. But let us have a sufficient number of clerks for these committees, that they may properly and speedily discharge their duties to this House and to the country. If the gentleman will not agree to that, I shall move an amendment or endeavor to effect the object by a resolution that my committee shall have a clerk.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I desire to say in reference to the statement that the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department had not a clerk last year that I find in the contingent expenses of that year this item:

P. M. Clark, clerk to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department, &c., additional compensation, act of March 3, 1875, three hundred and one days, at seventy-two cents per day, $216.72.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to say to the gentleman from Indiana that I wish to correct his error as to the facts in this case. I have obtained from the Clerk's office a statement of the number of committee clerks in the last House, and I find that the number was twenty-six. I hold the statement for the last session in my hand, subject to the gentleman's inspection. After that appointment of clerks was made there was, for special services, an assignment of two or three clerks for temporary service, but not to the number which the gentleman has stated. But the number authorized at the beginning of the session was twenty-six. I do not make any point on the propriety of the gentleman's recommendation; that is for his side of the House to determine. I only desire to correct an error in the statement of the facts which he made to the House.

Mr. FORT. I desire to state in explanation of this matter that in the last Congress there were clerks employed by the committees that were charged with investigating the expenditures of the Departments. It is true that they were not employed during the entire session. I have here, and, if any gentleman desires it, will send to the Clerk's desk to have read, the names of those clerks, and the amounts they received, that the House may know what clerks were appointed during a portion of the time for those committees.

Let me say further that it was deemed proper by the Committee on Accounts that when a committee is charged with investigating the affairs of the Post-Office Department they should have a clerk of their own. Formerly those committees were in the habit of asking the Department to furnish them a clerk. Then the clerk so assigned was supposed to be in accord with the committee; but it is manifestly improper now that a committee about to investigate a Department on charges of corruption should go to a Department and ask that Department to furnish them a clerk to investigate their own affairs. A clerk so appointed might reasonably be expected to side with the Department, and to cover up anything wrong, if wrong there be there. For my part, sir, as one member of the Committee on Accounts, I deem it proper that the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department should be authorized to employ their own clerk, and not have to go to the Post-Office Department and ask that one be detailed from that Department to serve on this committee. If there be wrong in that Department, I bid this committee Godspeed in finding it out; and I think they should be authorized to employ their own clerk, and not depend on the Post-Office Department to furnish a clerk to do their business. Miscellaneous Document No. 10, Forty-third Congress, second session, shows the fact that the several committees on the expenditures of the Departments were allowed and were furnished clerks by the respective Departments, and paid up to and including the month of June, 1874—J. C. Rowe, J. D. Laciar, and P. M. Clark acting for the respective Department Committees of Expenses of Justice, Treasury, and Post-Office.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. I desire to offer an amendment that the clerk of the Committee on Agriculture shall also be instructed to act as clerk of the Select Committee on the Centennial Celebration.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not understand that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILLIAMS] yields for an amendment.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield, that the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey may be offered?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. If other committees express a desire to have clerks, I shall be willing that action shall be taken upon that at another time and by another report. I call the previous question.

Mr. KELLEY. Before the gentleman calls the previous question, I ask him to allow an amendment to move to strike out the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. It is a palpable mistake. That committee has done its work. It is a merely nominal committee now. The laws have been revised, a report has been made, and there is nothing for the committee to do, and yet it is given a clerk, at the pay of $5 a day, when the place must be an absolute sinecure. I therefore hope that the gentleman will admit an amendment to strike out the clerk for that committee.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILLIAMS] yield for any amendment?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I do not. I ask the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the report of the Committee on Accounts was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana, moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 811) making appropriation for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1877; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed and made a special order for consideration immediately after the Military Academy bill.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I desire to reserve all points of order upon that bill.

ALABAMA CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question of privilege. I present the certificate of the secretary of state of Alabama, in relation to the contest for the seat from the fourth congressional district of Alabama, and I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

AMNESTY.

The SPEAKER. The business now in order is the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the motion to reconsider the vote by which the amnesty bill was rejected, and upon that question the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HILL] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, the House will bear witness that we have not sought this discussion. Nothing can be farther from our desire and purpose than to raise such discussion.

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to a point of order. The whole House desires to hear the gentleman from Georgia, but it is impossible for them to do so unless gentlemen retain their seats.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken, and gentlemen will retain their seats; and order must be preserved not only within the bar but outside the bar, and the Chair directs the Doorkeeper to give especial attention to the maintenance of order outside the bar.

Mr. HILL. I say, Mr. Speaker, that nothing could have been farther from the desires and purposes of those who with me represent immediately the section of country which on yesterday was put upon trial, than to re-open this discussion of the events of our unhappy past. We had well hoped that the country had suffered long enough from feuds, from strife, and from inflamed passions, and we came here, sir, with a patriotic purpose, to remember nothing but the country and the whole country, and, turning our backs upon all the horrors of the past, to look with all earnestness to find glories for the future.

The gentleman who is the acknowledged leader of the republican party on this floor, who is the aspiring leader of the republican party of this country, representing most manifestly the wishes of many of his associates—not all—has willed otherwise. They seem determined that the wounds which were healing shall be re-opened, that the passions which were hushing shall be re-inflamed. Sir, I wish this House to understand that we do not reciprocate either the purpose or the manifest desire of the gentlemen on the other side, and while we feel it our imperative duty to vindicate the truth of history as regards the section which we represent, feeling that it is a portion of this common country, we do not intend to say anything calculated to aid the gentlemen in their work of crimination and recrimination and of keeping up the war by politicians after brave men have said the war shall end. The gentleman from Maine on yesterday presented to the country two questions which he manifestly intends to be the fundamental principles of the republican party, or at least of those who follow him in that party. The first is what he is pleased to term the magnanimity and grace of the republican party; the second is the brutality of those whom he is pleased to term "the rebels." Upon the first question I do not propose to weary the House to-day. If with the history of the last fifteen years fresh in the memory of this people the country is prepared to talk about the grace and magnanimity of the republican party, argument would be wasted. With masters enslaved, intelligence disfranchised, society disorganized, industry paralyzed, States subverted, Legislatures dispersed by the bayonet, the people can accord to that party the verdict of grace and magnanimity, may God save the future of our country from grace and magnanimity.

I advance directly to that portion of the gentleman's argument which relates to the question before the House. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has presented to this House, and he asks it to adopt, a bill on the subject of amnesty which is precisely the same as the bill passed in this House by the gentleman's own party, as I understand it, at the last session of Congress. The gentleman from Maine has moved a reconsideration of the vote by which it was rejected, avowing his purpose to be to offer an amendment. The main purpose of that amendment is to except from the operation of the bill one of the citizens of this country, Mr. Jefferson Davis.

He alleges two distinct reasons why he asks the House to make that exception. I will state those reasons in the gentleman's own language. First, he says that "Mr. Davis was the author, knowingly, deliberately, guiltily, and willfully, of the gigantic murder and crime at Andersonville." That is a grave indictment. He then characterizes in his second position what he calls the horrors of Andersonville. And he says of them:

> And I here, before God, measuring my words, knowing their full extent and import, declare that neither the deeds of the Duke of Alva in the Low Countries, nor the massacre of Saint Bartholomew, nor the thumb-screws and engines of torture of the Spanish Inquisition, begin to compare in atrocity with the hideous crimes of Andersonville.

Sir, he stands before the country with his very fame in peril if he, having made such charges, shall not sustain them. Now I take up the propositions of the gentleman in their order. I hope no gentleman imagines that I am here to pass in eulogy upon Mr. Davis. The record upon which his fame must rest has been made up, and he and his friends have transmitted that record to the only judge who will give him an impartial judgment—an honest, unimpassioned posterity. In the mean time, no eulogy from me can help him, no censure from the gentleman can damage him, and no act or resolution of this House can affect him. But the charge is that he is a murderer, and a deliberate, willful, guilty, scheming murderer of "thousands of our fellow-citizens." Why, sir, knowing the character of the honorable gentleman from Maine, his high reputation, when I heard the charge fall from his lips I thought surely the gentleman had made a recent discovery, and I listened for the evidence to justify that charge. He produced it; and what is it? To my utter amazement, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] has well stated, it is nothing on earth but a report of a committee of this Congress, made when passions were at their height, and it was known to the gentleman and to the whole country eight years ago.

Now, I say first in relation to that testimony that it is exclusively ex parte. It was taken when the gentleman who is now put upon trial by it before the country was imprisoned and in chains, without a hearing and without an opportunity to be heard. It was taken by enemies. It was taken in the midst of fury and rage. If there is anything in Anglo-Saxon law which ought to be considered sacred, it is the high privilege of an Englishman not to be condemned until he shall be confronted with the witnesses against him. But that is not all. The testimony produced by the gentleman is not only ex parte, not only exclusively the production of enemies, or at least taken by them and in the midst of passion, but the testimony is mutilated, ingeniously mutilated, palpably mutilated, most adroitly mutilated. Why, sir, one of the main witnesses is Dr. Joseph Jones, a very excellent gentleman, who was called upon to give his testimony in what is called the Wirz trial, and which is produced before this House and attention called to it by the gentleman. The object of the gentleman was to prove that Mr. Davis knew of these atrocities at Andersonville, and he calls the attention of the House to the report of this committee, and thanks God that it has been taken in time to be put where it can neither be contradicted nor gainsaid, as a perpetual guide to posterity to find out the authors of these crimes.

One of the most striking and remarkable pieces of evidence in this whole report is found in the report made by Dr. Jones, a surgeon of fine character, and sent to Andersonville by the confederate authorities to investigate the condition of that prison. That gentleman made his report, and it is brought into this House. What is it? The first point is as to the knowledge of this report going to any of the authorities at Richmond. Here is what Dr. Jones says:

> I had just completed the report, which I placed in the hands of the judge-advocate, under orders from the Government, when the confederacy went to pieces. That report never was delivered to the surgeon-general, and I was unaware that any one knew of its existence until I received orders from the United States Government to bring it and deliver it to this court in testimony.

Now, he was ordered by the United States Government, the first time this report ever saw the light, to bring it and deliver it on the trial of Wirz. In accordance with that order he did bring it and deliver it to the Judge-Advocate-General. And when the report itself, or that which purported to be the report, was presented to him while he was a witness he discovered that it was mutilated, and he asked permission to state that fact. Hear what he says on that subject:

> I beg leave to make a statement to the court. That portion of my repor which has been read is only a small part of the report. The real report contains the excuses which were given by the officers present at Andersonville, which I thought it right to embody with my report. It also contains documents forwarded to Richmond by Dr. White and Dr. Stevenson, and others in charge of the hospitals. Those documents contained important facts as to the labors of the medical department and their efforts to better the condition of things.

All that part of the report is suppressed; and with that suppression this magnificent receptacle of truth is filed away in the document-room for the information of posterity!

The committee ask him:

> Question. Are your conclusions correctly stated in this extract?
> Answer. Part of my conclusions are stated—not the whole. A portion of my conclusions, and also my recommendations, are not stated.
> Q. Well, touching the subject of exchange?
> A. Yes, sir; the general difficulties environing the prisoners and their officers.
> Q. What became of your original report?
> A. This is my original report.

That is, he had there the extract as far as it went.

> Q. Did you make this extract yourself?

The committee seem to suspect that he was the man that simply made the extract and brought it before the committee. Now, here is his answer:

> I did not. My original report is in the hands of the judge-advocate. I delivered it into his hands immediately upon my arrival in Washington.

And this committee of Congress to which the gentleman refers absolutely tells us that this mutilated report was the one introduced in evidence against this man Wirz, and it is the one incorporated in this book.

Now I want to call attention to another extract from that original report—a part not included in this book. There are a great many such omissions; I have not been able to get all of them.

Dr. Jones in his report is giving an account of the causes of the sickness and mortality at Andersonville; and he says, among other things:

> Surrounded by these depressing agents, the postponement of the general exchange of prisoners and the constantly receding hopes of deliverance through the action of their own Government depressed their already desponding spirits and destroyed those mental and moral energies so necessary for a successful struggle against disease and its agents. Homesickness and disappointment, mental depression and distress, attending the daily longing for an apparently hopeless release, are felt to be as potent agencies in the destruction of these prisoners as the physical causes of actual disease.

Ah! why that homesickness, that longing and the distress consequent upon it, and its effect in carrying those poor, brave, unfortunate heroes to death? I will tell this House before I am done.

Now, sir, there is another fact. Wirz was put on trial, but really Mr. Davis was the man intended to be tried through him. Over one hundred and sixty witnesses were introduced before the military commission. The trial lasted three months. The whole country was under military despotism; citizens labored under duress; and quite a large number of confederates were seeking to make favor with the powers of the Government. Yet, sir, during those three months, with all the witnesses they could bring to Washington, not one single man ever mentioned the name of Mr. Davis in connection with a single atrocity at Andersonville or elsewhere. The gentleman from Maine, with all his research into all the histories of the Duke of Alva and the massacre of St. Bartholomew and the Spanish inquisition, has not been able to frighten up such a witness yet.

Now, sir, there is a witness on this subject. Wirz was condemned, found guilty, sentenced to be executed; and I have now before me the written statement of his counsel, a northern man and a Union man. He gave this statement to the country, and it has never been contradicted.

Hear what this gentleman says:

> On the night before the execution of the prisoner Wirz a telegram was sent to the northern press from this city, stating that Wirz had made important disclosures to General L. C. Baker, the well-known detective, implicating Jefferson Davis, and that the confession would probably be given to the public. On the same evening some parties came to the confessor of Wirz, Rev. Father Boyle, and also to me as his counsel, one of them informing me that a high Cabinet officer wished to assure Wirz that if he would implicate Jefferson Davis with the atrocities committed at Andersonville his sentence would be commuted. The messenger requested me to inform Wirz of this. In presence of Father Boyle I told Wirz next morning what had happened.

Hear the reply:

> Captain Wirz simply and quietly replied: "Mr. Schade, you know that I have always told you that I do not know anything about Jefferson Davis. He had no connection with me as to what was done at Andersonville. I would not become a traitor against him or anybody else even to save my life."

Sir, what Wirz, within two hours of his execution, would not say for his life the gentleman from Maine says to the country to keep himself and his party in power. Christianity is a falsehood, humanity is a lie, civilization is a cheat, or the man who would not make a false charge for his life was never guilty of willful murder.

He who makes a charge must produce his witnesses. They must be informed witnesses. They must be credible witnesses. The gentleman from Maine makes his charge, but produces no witnesses. He says that men sent by Jefferson Davis to Andersonville were his officers, executing his orders, commissioned by him, and he therefore charges Mr. Davis with these atrocities by inference. It was only when the gentleman reached that portion of his argument that I thought I began to discover the real purpose of his movement. I will not charge him with it, but a suggestion came immediately to my mind.

What was the proposition which the gentleman proposes to establish? It is that those high in authority are to be charged with the sins and treacheries of their agents, commissioned by them and acting under their orders. Is the gentleman artfully—I beg pardon—

under the cover of the prejudice and passion against Jefferson Davis, seeking to assault President Grant? If Jefferson Davis sent General Winder to Andersonville, why President Grant sent McDonald and Joyce to Saint Louis. [Laughter.] Nay, more, sir; is not the very secretary of the White House, the private confidential secretary, indicted to-day for complicity in these frauds? Does the gentleman want to establish a rule of construction by which he can authorize the country to arraign General Grant for complicity in the whisky frauds? [Laughter.]

Sir, is General Grant responsible for the Credit Mobilier? Was he a stockholder in the Sanborn contracts? Was he copartner in the frauds upon this District? With all his witnesses, the gentleman never can find a single man who was confidential secretary of Mr. Davis and charged with complicity in crime, that Mr. Davis ever indorsed any man as fit for office who was even gravely charged with any complicity in fraud. Yet the gentleman's President, as I understand it, absolutely sent to the Senate of the United States for confirmation to a high office the very man who stood charged before the country with the grossest peculations and frauds in this District, and that, too, after these charges were made and while the investigation was pending.

Sir, I am neither the author nor the disciple of such political logic. And I will not, nor would I for any consideration, assume the proposition before this House to punish an enemy which would implicate the president of the United States in the grossest frauds. Yet if the gentleman's proposition be true, General Grant, instead of being entitled to a third Presidential term, is entitled to twenty terms in twenty penitentiaries. But, sir, he is not guilty. The argument is false. It is a libel upon the American rule of law and English precedent. You cannot find its precedent anywhere in any civilized country. I acquit General Grant of complicity in the whisky frauds and revenue frauds, and the facts acquit Mr. Davis of complicity in any atrocity anywhere.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I pass from the construction of that question to the real facts about Andersonville. First, I want to call the attention of the House to the law of the confederate government on the subject of the treatment of prisoners. I read from the act of the confederate congress on that subject; it was very simple, and directed—

The rations furnished prisoners of war shall be the same in quantity and quality as those furnished to enlisted men in the army of the confederacy.

That was the law; that was the law Mr. Davis approved, and that was the law that he, so far as his agency was concerned, executed.

The gentleman in his speech has gone so far as to say that Mr. Davis purposely sent General Winder to Andersonville to organize a den of horrors and kill Federal soldiers. I do not quote exactly his language, but I know it is "to organize a den of horrors;" but I am sure I cannot use any language more bitter than the gentleman used himself. Therefore the next thing I will read is the order given for the purpose of locating this prison at Andersonville, or wherever it should be properly located. The official order for the location of the stockade enjoins that it should be in a "healthy locality, with plenty of pure water, with a running stream, and, if possible, with shade trees, and in the immediate neighborhood of grist and saw mills." That does not look like the organization of a den of horrors to commit murder. That was the official order. That was not all. These prisoners at Andersonville were not only allowed the rations measured out to confederate soldiers both in quantity and quality in every respect, but they were allowed also to buy as much outside as they desired; a privilege, I am reliably informed, which was not extended to many of the confederate prisoners. I do not know how that is.

I do not wish to charge it if the facts were otherwise. But in the book which the gentleman from Maine himself produces we find this testimony, given by a Union soldier. He says:

We never had any difficulty in getting vegetables; we used to buy almost anything that we wanted of the sergeant who called the roll mornings and nights. His name was Smith, I think; he was Captain Wirz's chief sergeant. We were divided into messes, eight in each mess; my mess used to buy from two to four bushels of sweet potatoes a week, at the rate of $15 confederate money per bushel.

They got $20 of confederate money for $1 of greenbacks in those days.

Turnips we bought at $20 a bushel. We had to buy our own soap for washing our own persons and clothing; we bought meat and eggs and biscuit. There seemed to be an abundance of those things; they were in the market constantly. That sergeant used to come down with a wagon-load of potatoes at a time, bringing twenty or twenty-five bushels at a load sometimes.

Now, sir, Mr. Davis himself alluded to that privilege which was allowed to the Federal soldiers. The confederate authorities not only allowed them to purchase supplies as they pleased outside, in addition to the rations allowed them by law—the same rations allowed to confederate soldiers—but he says:

By an indulgence perhaps unprecedented, we have even allowed the prisoners in our hands to be supplied by their friends at home with comforts not enjoyed by the men who captured them in battle.

The confederate government gave Federal prisoners the same rations that confederate soldiers in the field received. Federal prisoners had permission to buy whatever else they pleased, and the confederates gave their friends at home permission to furnish them the means to do so. And yet, Mr. Speaker, it is true that, in spite of all these advantages enjoyed by these prisoners, there were horrors, and great horrors, at Andersonville. What were the causes of those horrors? The first was want of medicine. That is given as a cause by Dr. Jones in his testimony; that is given by this very Father Hamilton, from whom the gentleman from Maine read. In the very same testimony which the gentleman read Father Hamilton says:

I conversed with Dr. White with regard to the condition of the men, and he told me it was not in his power to do anything for them; that he had no medicine, and could not get any, and that he was doing everything in his power to help them.

Now, how was it that medicines and other essential supplies could not be obtained? Unfortunately they were not in the confederacy. The Federal Government made medicine contraband of war. And I am not aware that any other nation on the earth ever did such a thing before—not even the Duke of Alva, sir. The confederate government, unable to introduce medicines according to its right under the laws of nations, undertook to run the blockade, and whenever possible the Federal Navy captured its ships and took the medicines. Then, when no other resource was left, when it was suspected that the women of the North—the earth's angels, God bless them—would carry quinine and other medicines of that sort, so much needed by the Federal prisoners in the South, Federal officers were charged to capture the women and examine their petticoats, to keep them from carrying medicines to confederate soldiers and to Federal prisoners, and they were imprisoned. Surely, sir, the confederate government and the southern people are not to be blamed for a poverty in medicines, food, and raiment enforced by the stringent war measures of the Federal Government—a poverty which had its intended effect of immeasurable distress to the confederate armies, although it incidentally inflicted unavoidable distress upon the Federal prisoners in the South.

The Federal Government made clothing contraband of war. It sent down its armies and they burned up the factories of the South wherever they could find them, for the express purpose of preventing the confederates from furnishing clothes to their soldiers, and the Federal prisoners of course shared this deprivation of comfortable clothing. It was the war policy of the Federal Government to make supplies scarce. Dr. Jones in his testimony and Father Hamilton in his testimony, which I will not stop to read to the House, explained why clothing was so scarce to Federal prisoners.

Now then, sir, whatever horrors existed at Andersonville, not one of them could be attributed to a single act of legislation of the confederate government or to a single order of the confederate government, but every horror of Andersonville grew out of the necessities of the occasion, which necessities were cast upon the confederacy by the war policy of the other side. The gentleman from Maine said that no confederate prisoner was ever maltreated in the North. And when my friend answered from his seat "a thousand witnesses to the contrary in Georgia alone," the gentleman from Maine joined issue, but as usual produced no testimony in support of his issue. I think the gentleman from Maine is to be excused. For ten years unfortunately he and his have been reviling the people who were not allowed to come here to meet the reviling. Now, sir, we are face to face, and when you make a charge you must bring your proof. The time has passed when the country can accept the impudence of assertion for the force of argument or recklessness of statement for the truth of history.

Now, sir, I do not wish to unfold the chapter on the other side. I am an American. I honor my country, and my whole country, and it could be no pleasure to me to bring forward proof that any portion of my countrymen have been guilty of willful murder or of cruel treatment to poor manacled prisoners. Nor will I make any such charge. These horrors are inseparable, many of them and most of them from a state of war. I hold in my hand a letter written by one who was a surgeon at the prison at Elmira, and he says:

The winter of 1864,1865 was an unusually severe and rigid one, and the prisoners arriving from the Southern States during this season were mostly old men and lads, clothed in attire suitable only to the genial climate of the South. I need not state to you that this alone was ample cause for an unusual mortality among them. The surroundings were of the following nature, namely: narrow, confined limits, but a few acres in extent—and through which slowly flowed a turbid stream of water, carrying along with it all the excremental filth and débris of the camp; this stream of water, horrible to relate, was the only source of supply, for an extended period, that the prisoners could possibly use for the purpose of ablution and to slack their thirst from day to day; the tents and other shelter allotted to the camp at Elmira were insufficient and crowded to the utmost extent; hence small-pox and other skin diseases raged through the camp.

Here I may note that, owing to a general order from the Government to vaccinate the prisoners, my opportunities were ample to observe the effects of spurious and diseased matter, and there is no doubt in my mind but that syphilis was ingrafted in many instances; ugly and horrible ulcers and eruptions of a characteristic nature were, alas! too frequent and obvious to be mistaken. Small-pox cases were crowded in such a manner that it was a matter of impossibility for the surgeon to treat his patient individually; they actually laid so adjacent that the simple movement of one would cause his neighbor to cry out in an agony of pain. The confluent and malignant type prevailed to such an extent and of such a nature that the body would frequently be found one continuous scab.

The diet and other allowances by the Government for the use of the prisoners were ample, yet the poor unfortunates were allowed to starve.

Now, sir, the confederate regulations authorized ample provision for Federal prisoners, the same that was made for confederate soldiers, and you charge that Mr. Davis is responsible for not having those allowances honestly supplied. The United States made provision for confederate prisoners, so far as rations were concerned, for feeding those in Federal hands; and yet what says the surgeon? "They were allowed to starve."

But "why?" is a query which I will allow your readers to infer and to draw conclusions therefrom. Out of the number of prisoners, as before mentioned, over three thousand of them now lay buried in the cemetery located near the camp for that purpose—a mortality equal if not greater than that of any prison in the South. At Andersonville, as I am well informed by brother-officers who endured confinement there, as well as by the records at Washington, the mortality was twelve thousand out of, say, forty thousand prisoners. Hence it is readily to be seen that the range of mortality was no less at Elmira than at Andersonville.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment to ask him where he gets that statement?

Mr. HILL. It is the statement of a Federal surgeon published in the New York World.

Mr. PLATT. I desire to say that I live within thirty-six miles of Elmira, and that those statements are unqualifiedly false.

Mr. HILL. Yes, and I suppose if one rose from the dead the gentleman would not believe him.

Mr. PLATT. Does the gentleman say that those statements are true?

Mr. HILL. Certainly I do not say that they are true, but I do say that I believe the statement of the surgeon in charge before that of a politician thirty-six miles away. Now will the gentleman believe testimony from the dead? The Bible says, "The tree is known by its fruits." And, after all, what is the test of suffering of these prisoners North and South? The test is the result. Now I call the attention of gentlemen to this fact, that the report of Mr. Stanton, the Secretary of War—you will believe him, will you not?—on the 19th of July, 1866—send to the Library and get it—exhibits the fact that of the Federal prisoners in confederate hands during the war only 22,576 died, while of the confederate prisoners in Federal hands 26,436 died. And Surgeon-General Barnes reports in an official report—I suppose you will believe him—that in round numbers the confederate prisoners in Federal hands amounted to 220,000, while the Federal prisoners in confederate hands amounted to 270,000. Out of the 270,000 in confederate hands 22,000 died, while of the 220,000 confederates in Federal hands over 26,000 died. The ratio is this: More than 12 per cent. of the confederates in Federal hands died, and less than 9 per cent. of the Federals in confederate hands died. What is the logic of these facts according to the gentleman from Maine? I scorn to charge murder upon the officials of northern prisons, as the gentleman has done upon confederate prison officials. I labor to demonstrate that such miseries are inevitable in prison life, no matter how humane the regulations. I would scorn, too, to use a newspaper article, unless it were signed by one who gave his own name and whose statement, if not true, can be disproved, and I would believe such a one in preference to any politician over there who was thirty-six miles away from Elmira. That gentleman, so prompt to contradict a surgeon, might perhaps have smelled the small-pox but he could not see it, and I venture to say that if he knew the small-pox was there he would have taken very good care to keep thirty-six miles away. He is a wonderful witness. He is not even equal to the mutilated evidence brought in yesterday. But, sir, it appears from the official record that the confederates came from Elmira, from Fort Delaware, and from Rock Island and other places with their fingers frozen off, with their toes frozen off, and with their teeth dropped out.

But the great question is behind. Every American, North or South, must lament that our country has ever impeached its civilization by such an exhibition of horrors on any side, and I speak of these things with no degree of pleasure. God knows if I could hide them from the view of the world I would gladly do it. But the great question is, at last, who was responsible for this state of things? And that is really the only material question with which statesmen now should deal. Sir, it is well known that, when the war opened, at first the authorities of the United States determined that they would not exchange prisoners. The first prisoners captured by the Federal forces were the crew of the Savannah, and they were put in chains and sentenced to be executed. Jefferson Davis hearing of this, communicated through the lines, and the confederates having meanwhile also captured prisoners, he threatened retaliation in case those men suffered, and the sentences against the crew of the Savannah were not executed. Subsequently our friends from this way—I believe my friend before me from New York [Mr. COX] was one—insisted that there should be a cartel for the exchange of prisoners. In 1862 that cartel was agreed upon. In substance and briefly it was that there should be an exchange of man for man and officer for officer, and whichever held an excess at the time of exchange should parole the excess. This worked very well until 1863. I am going over the facts very briefly.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I do not wish, and none on this side wishes to interrupt the gentleman. I believe he has spoken over his hour. We desire that he shall speak as long as he chooses, but we wish to have a free discussion and want a little time on this side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia has not exhausted his hour yet.

Mr. HILL. I was reciting briefly the facts. In 1863 this cartel was interrupted; the Federal authorities refused to continue the exchange. Now commenced a history which the world ought to know, and which I hope the House will grant me the privilege of stating, and I shall do it from official records. This, I say frankly to the gentlemen on the other side, was in truth one of the severest blows stricken at the confederacy, this refusal to exchange prisoners in 1863 and continued through 1864. The confederates made every effort to renew the cartel. Among other things, on the 2d of July, 1863, the vice-president of the confederacy, the gentleman to whom the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] alluded the other day in so complimentary terms, Mr. Alexander H. Stephens, was absolutely commissioned by President Davis to cross the lines and come to Washington to consult with the Federal authorities, with a broad commission to agree upon any cartel satisfactory to the other side for the exchange of prisoners. Mr. Davis said to him, "Your mission is simply one of humanity, and has no political aspect." Mr. Stephens undertook that work. What was the result? I wish to be careful, and I will state this exactly correctly. Here is his letter:

CONFEDERATE STATES STEAMER TORPEDO,
In James River, July 4, 1863

SIR: As military commissioner, I am the bearer of a communication in writing from Jefferson Davis, commander-in-chief of the land and naval forces of the Confederate States, to Abraham Lincoln, Commander-in-Chief of the land and naval forces of the United States. Hon. Robert Ould, Confederate States agent of exchange, accompanies me as secretary, for the purpose of delivering the communication in person and conferring upon the subject to which it relates. I desire to proceed to Washington in the steamer Torpedo, commanded by Lieutenant Hunter Davidson, of the Confederate States navy, no person being on board but Hon. Mr. Ould, myself, and the boat's officers and crew.

Yours, most respectfully,

ALEX. H. STEPHENS.

To S. H. LEE, Admiral.

This was directed to S. H. Lee, admiral. Here is the answer:

Acting Rear-Admiral S. H. LEE, Hampton Roads:

The request of Alexander H. Stephens is inadmissible. * * *

GIDEON WELLES,
Secretary of the Navy

You will acknowledge that Mr. Stephens's humane mission failed. The confederate authorities gave to that mission as much dignity and character as possible. They supposed that of all men in the South Mr. Stephens most nearly had your confidence. They selected him to be the bearer of messages for the sake of humanity in behalf of the brave Federal soldiers who were unfortunately prisoners of war. The Federal Government would not even receive him; the Federal authorities would not hear him.

What was the next effort? After Mr. Stephens's mission failed, and after the commissioner for the exchange of prisoners, Colonel Ould, having exhausted all his efforts to get the cartel renewed, on the 24th January, 1864, wrote the following letter to Major-General E. A. Hitchcock, agent of exchange on the Federal side:

CONFEDERATE STATES OF AMERICA, WAR DEPARTMENT,
Richmond, Virginia, January 24, 1864.

SIR: In view of the present difficulties attending the exchange and release of prisoners, I propose that all such on either side shall be attended by a proper number of their own surgeons, who, under rules to be established, shall be permitted to take charge of their health and comfort. I also propose that these surgeons shall act as commissaries, with power to receive and distribute such contributions of money, food, clothing, and medicines as may be forwarded for the relief of the prisoners. I further propose that these surgeons shall be selected by their own government, and that they shall have full liberty, at any and all times, through the agents of exchange, to make reports not only of their own acts, but of any matters relating to the welfare of the prisoners.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

ROBERT OULD,
Agent of Exchange.

Major-General E. A. HITCHCOCK,
Agent of Exchange.

The SPEAKER. The hour of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RANDALL. I move the gentleman from Georgia be allowed to proceed.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not object; but before the gentleman from Georgia passes from the subject upon which he is now speaking, I would be glad to know——

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the gentleman from Georgia will have leave to proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLAINE. I believe the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HILL] was a member of the confederate senate. I find in a historical book of some authenticity of character that in the confederate congress Senator Hill, of Georgia, introduced the following resolution, relating to prisoners——

Mr. HILL. You are putting me on trial now, are you? Go ahead.

Mr. BLAINE. This is the resolution:

That every person pretending to be a soldier or officer of the United States who shall be captured on the soil of the Confederate States after the 1st day of January, 1863, shall be presumed to have entered the territory of the Confederate States with the intent to incite insurrection and abet murder; and, unless satisfactory proof be adduced to the contrary before the military court before which the trial shall be had, shall suffer death. This section shall continue in force until the proclamation issued by Abraham Lincoln, dated at Washington on the 22d day of September, 1862, shall be rescinded, and the policy therein announced shall be abandoned, and no longer.

Mr. HILL. I will say to the gentleman from Maine very frankly that I have not the slightest recollection of ever hearing that resolution before.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentlemen does not deny, however, that he was the author of it?

Mr. HILL. I do not know. My own impression is that I was not the author; but I do not pretend to recollect the circumstances. If the gentleman can give me the circumstances under which the resolution was introduced, they might recall the matter to my mind.

Mr. BLAINE. Allow me to read further:

October 1, 1862.—The judiciary committee of the confederate congress made a report and offered a set of resolutions upon the subject of President Lincoln's proclamation, from which the following are extracts:

2. Every white person who shall act as a commissioned or non-commissioned officer commanding negroes or mulattoes against the Confederate States, or who shall arm, organize, train, or prepare negroes or mulattoes for military service, or aid them in any military enterprise against the Confederate States, shall, if captured, suffer death.

3. Every commissioned or non-commissioned officer of the enemy who shall incite slaves to rebellion, or pretend to give them freedom under the aforementioned act of Congress and proclamation, by abducting or causing them to be abducted or inducing them to abscond, shall, if captured, suffer death.

Thereupon Senator Hill, of Georgia, is recorded as having offered the resolution I have read.

Mr. HILL. I was chairman of the judiciary committee of the senate.

Mr. BLAINE. And this resolution came directly from that committee?

Mr. HILL. It is very probable that, like the chairman of the Committee on the Rules at the last session, I may have consented to that report. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman then admits that he did make that report?

Mr. HILL. I really do not remember it. I think it very likely.

A MEMBER, (to Mr. BLAINE.) What is the book?

Mr. BLAINE. The book from which I have read is entitled "Republicanism in America," by R. Guy McClellan. It appears to be a book of good credit and authenticity. I merely want it settled whether the gentleman from Georgia was or was not the author of that resolution.

Mr. HILL. I say to the gentleman frankly that I really do not remember.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman does not say he was not the author.

Mr. HILL. I do not. I will say this: I think I was not the author. Possibly I reported the resolution. It refers in terms to "pretended," not real soldiers.

Mr. BLAINE. I thought that inasmuch as the gentleman's line of argument was to show the character of the confederate policy, this might aid him a little in calling up the facts pertinent thereto. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HILL. With all due deference to the gentleman, I reply he did not think any such thing. He thought he would divert me from the purpose of my argument and break its force by——

Mr. BLAINE. O no.

Mr. HILL. He thought he would get up a discussion about certain measures presented in the confederate congress having no relation to the subject now under discussion, but which grew out of the peculiar relation of the Southern States to a population then in servitude—a population which the confederate government feared might be incited to insurrection—and measures were doubtless proposed which the confederate government may have thought it proper to take to protect helpless women and children in the South from insurrection. But I shall not allow myself to be diverted by the gentleman to go either into the history of slavery or of domestic insurrection, or, as a friend near me suggests, "John Brown's raid." I know this, that if I or any gentleman on the committee was the author of that resolution, which I think more than probable, our purpose was not to do injustice to any man, woman, or child North or South, but to adopt what we deemed stringent measures within the laws of war to protect our wives and children from servile insurrection and slaughter while our brave sons were in the front. That is all, sir.

But, sir, I have read a letter from the confederate commissioner of exchange, written in 1864, proposing that each side send surgeons with the prisoners; that they nurse and treat the prisoners; that the Federal authorities should send as many as they pleased; that those surgeons be commissioned also as commissaries to furnish supplies of clothing and food and everything else needed for the comfort of prisoners.

Now, sir, how did the Federal Government treat that offer? It broke the cartel for the exchange of prisoners; it refused to entertain a proposition, even when Mr. Stephens headed the commission, to renew it; and then, sir, when the confederates proposed that their own surgeons should accompany the prisoners of the respective armies, the Federal authorities did not answer the letter. No reply was ever received.

Then, again, in August, 1864, the confederates made two more propositions. I will state that the cartel of exchange was broken by the Federal authorities for certain alleged reasons. Well, in August, 1864, prisoners accumulating on both sides to such extent, the Federal Government having refused every proposition from the confederate authorities to provide for the comfort and treatment of these prisoners, the confederates next proposed, in a letter from Colonel Ould, dated the 10th of August, 1864, waiving every objection the Federal Government had made, to agree to any and all terms to renew the exchange of prisoners, man for man and officer for officer, as the Federal Government should prescribe. Yet, sir, the latter rejected that proposition. It took a second letter to bring an answer to that proposition.

Then, again, in that same month of August, 1864, the confederate authorities did this: Finding that the Federal Government would not exchange prisoners at all, that it would not let surgeons go into the confederacy; finding that it would not let medicines be sent into the confederacy; meanwhile the ravages of war continuing and depleting the scant supplies of the South, which was already unable to feed adequately its own defenders, and much less able to properly feed and clothe the thousands of prisoners in confederate prisons, what did the confederates propose? They proposed to send the Federal sick and wounded prisoners without equivalent. Now, sir, I want the House and the country to understand this: that in August, 1864, the confederate government officially proposed to the Federal authorities that if they would send steamships or transportation in any form to Savannah, they should have their sick and wounded prisoners without equivalent. That proposition, communicated to the Federal authorities in August, 1864, was not answered until December, 1864. In December, 1864, the Federal Government sent ships to Savannah. Now, the records will show that the chief suffering at Andersonville was between August and December. The confederate authorities sought to avert it by asking the Federal Government to come and take its prisoners without equivalent, without return, and it refused to do that until four or five months had elapsed.

That is not the only appeal which was made to the Federal Government. I now call the attention of the House to another appeal. It was from the Federal prisoners themselves. They knew as well as the southern people did the mission of Mr. Stephens. They knew the offer of January 24, for surgeons, for medicine and clothing, for comforts and food, and for provisions of every sort. They knew that the confederate authorities had offered to let these be sent to them by their own Government. They knew that had been rejected. They knew of the offer of August 10, 1864. They knew of the other offer, to return sick and wounded without an equivalent. They knew all these offers had been rejected. Therefore they held a meeting and passed the following resolutions; and I call the attention of the gentlemen on the other side to these resolutions. I ask if they will not believe the surgeons of their hospitals; if they will not believe Mr. Stanton's report, if they will not believe Surgeon-General Barnes's report, I beg from them to know if they will not believe the earnest, heart-rending appeal of those starving, suffering heroes? Here are the resolutions passed by the Federal prisoners the 28th of September, 1864:

Resolved, That while allowing the confederate authorities all due praise for the attention paid to our prisoners, numbers of our men are daily consigned to early graves, in the prime of manhood, far from home and kindred, and this is not caused intentionally by the confederate government, but by the force of circumstances.

Brave men are always honest, and true soldiers never slander. They say the horrors they suffered were not intentional, that the confederate government had done all it could to avert them. Sir, I believe this testimony of gallant men as being of the highest character, coming from the sufferers themselves.

They further resolved:

The prisoner is obliged to go without shelter, and in a great portion of cases without medicine.

Resolved, That whereas in the fortune of war it was our lot to become prisoners, we have suffered patiently, and are still willing to suffer, if by so doing we can benefit the country; but we would most respectfully beg to say that we are not willing to suffer to further the ends of any party or clique to the detriment of our own honor, our families, and our country. And we would beg this affair be explained to us, that we may continue to hold the Government in the respect which is necessary to make a good citizen and soldier.

Was this touching appeal heeded? Let any gentleman who belonged to the "clique or party" that the resolutions condemn answer for his party.

Now, sir, it was in reference to that state of things exactly that Dr. Jones reported, as I have already read to the House, in his report which was mutilated before that committee of Congress and in the trial of Wirz—it was in consequence of that very state of things that Dr. Jones said that depression of mind and despondency and homesickness of these poor prisoners carried more to their graves than did physical causes of disease. That was not wonderful at all.

But, Mr. Speaker, why were all these appeals resisted? Why did the Federal authorities refuse to allow their own surgeons to go with their own soldiers, and carry them medicine and clothing and comfort and treatment? Why? Why did they refuse to exchange man for man and officer for officer? Why did they refuse to stand up to their own solemn engagements, made in 1862, for the exchange of prisoners? Who is at fault? There must be a reason for this. That is the next point to which I wish to call the attention of the House. Sir, listen to the reading. The New York Tribune, referring to this matter in 1864, said—I suppose you will believe the Tribune in 1864, if you do not believe it now:

In August the rebels offered to renew the exchange man for man. General Grant then telegraphed the following important order: It is hard on our men held in southern prisons not to exchange them, but it is humanity to those left in the ranks to fight our battles. Every man released on parole or otherwise becomes an active soldier against us at once, either directly or indirectly. If we commence a system of exchange which liberates all prisoners taken, we will have to fight on till the whole South is exterminated. If we hold those caught, they amount to no more than dead men. At this particular time to release all rebel prisoners North would insure Sherman's defeat and would compromise our safety here.

Mr. GARFIELD. What date is that?

Mr. HILL. Eighteen hundred and sixty-four.

Mr. GARFIELD. What date in that year.

Mr. HILL. I do not note the day or month. I have read the telegram which is taken from the New York Tribune, after August, 1864.

Here is General Grant's testimony before the committee on the exchange of prisoners, February 11, 1865. You believe him, do you not?

Question. It has been said that we refused to exchange prisoners because we found ours starved, diseased, and unserviceable when we received them, and did not like to exchange sound men for such men.

That was the question propounded to him. His answer was:

Answer. There never has been any such reason as that. That has been a reason for making exchanges. I will confess that if our men who are prisoners in the South were really well taken care of, suffering nothing except a little privation of liberty, then, in a military point of view, it would not be good policy for us to exchange, because every man they get back is forced right into the army at once, while that is not the case with our prisoners when we receive them; in fact, the half of our returned prisoners will never go into the Army again, and none of them will until after they have had a furlough of thirty or sixty days. Still, the fact of their suffering as they do is a reason for making this exchange as rapidly as possible.

Q. And never has been a reason for not making the exchange?

A. It never has. Exchanges having been suspended by reason of disagreement on the part of agents of exchange on both sides before I came in command of the armies of the United States; and it then being near the opening of the spring campaign I did not deem it advisable or just to the men who had to fight our battles to re-enforce the enemy with thirty or forty thousand disciplined troops at that time. An immediate resumption of exchanges would have had that effect without giving us corresponding benefits. The suffering said to exist among our prisoners South was a powerful argument against the course pursued, and so I felt it.

There is no disputing the fact that, with the knowledge that his prisoners were suffering in the South, he insisted that the exchange should not be renewed, because it would increase the military power of the enemy. Now, that may have been a good military reason. I do not quote it for the purpose of reflecting upon General Grant in the slightest. I am giving the facts of history. I insist that the confederacy shall not be held responsible for the results of the war policy of the Federal Government, especially when the record proves that the confederate authorities made every possible effort to avert these results. Nor do I allege inhumanity on the part of General Grant or the Federal Government. I give you the facts, and I have given you General Grant's interpretation of those facts. Let the world judge.

Now, sir, we have other authority upon that subject. Here is a letter by Junius Henri Browne. I do not know the gentleman. He signs his name to the letter. He writes like a scholar. He is a northern gentleman, and I am not aware that his statement has ever been contradicted. Now, what does he say?

NEW YORK, August 8, 1865.

Moreover, General Butler, in his speech at Lowell, Massachusetts, stated positively that he had been ordered by Mr. Stanton to put forward the negro question to complicate and prevent the exchange. * * * Every one is aware that when the exchange did take place not the slightest alteration had occurred in the question, and that our prisoners might as well have been released twelve or eighteen months before as at the resumption of the cartel, which would have saved to the Republic at least twelve or fifteen thousand heroic lives.

That they were not saved is due alone to Mr. Edwin M Stanton's peculiar policy and dogged obstinacy; and, as I have remarked before, he is unquestionably the digger of the unnamed graves that crowd the vicinity of every southern prison with historic and never-to-be forgotten horrors.

That is the testimony of a northern man against Mr. Stanton. And he goes on:

I regret the revival of this painful subject, but the gratuitous effort of Mr. Dana to relieve the Secretary of War from a responsibility he seems willing to bear, and which merely as a question of policy independent of all considerations of humanity must be regarded as of great weight, has compelled me to vindicate myself from the charge of making grave statements without due consideration.

Once for all, let me declare that I have never found fault with any one because I was detained in prison, for I am well aware that that was a matter in which no one but myself and possibly a few personal friends would feel any interest; that my sole motive for impeaching the Secretary of War was that the people of the loyal North might know to whom they were indebted for the cold-blooded and needless sacrifice of their fathers and brothers, their husbands and their sons.

I understand that Mr. Browne is a contributor to Harper's Monthly, and was then. The man, so he tells you, who was responsible for these atrocities at Andersonville was the late Secretary of War, Mr. Stanton.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what have I proven? I have proven that the Federal authorities broke the cartel for the exchange of prisoners deliberately; I have proven that they refused to re-open that cartel when it was proposed by Mr. Stephens, as a commissioner, solely on the ground of humanity; I have proven that they made medicine contraband of war, and thereby left the South to the dreadful necessity of treating their own prisoners with such medicines as could be improvised in the confederacy; I have proven that they refused to allow surgeons of their own appointment, of their own Army, to accompany their prisoners in the South, with full license and liberty to carry food, medicine, and raiment, and every comfort that the prisoners might need; I have proven that when the Federal Government made the pretext for interrupting the cartel for the exchange of prisoners, the confederates yielded every point and proposed to exchange prisoners on the terms of the Federal Government, and that the latter refused it; I have proven that the confederates then proposed to return the Federal sick and wounded without equivalent in August, 1864, and never got a reply until December, 1864; I have proven that high Federal officers gave as the reason why they would not exchange prisoners that it would be humanity to the prisoners but cruelty to the soldiers in the field, and therefore it was a part of the Federal military policy to let Federal prisoners suffer rather than that the confederacy should have an increase of its military force, and the Federal Government refused it, when by such exchange it would have received more prisoners than it returned to the confederates.

Now, what is the answer to all this? Against whom does the charge lie, if there are to be accusations of any, for the horrors of Andersonville?

Mr. BRIGHT. What was the percentage of deaths in the prisons?

Mr. HILL. I have already given it. I have proved also that, with all the horrors at Andersonville, the gentleman from Maine has so ostentatiously paraded, and for an obvious partisan purpose of exciting upon this floor a bitter sectional discussion, from which his party, and perhaps himself, may be the beneficiary, greater sufferings occurred in the prisons where confederate soldiers were confined, and that the percentage of death was 3 per cent. greater among confederate troops in Federal hands than among Federal soldiers held by the confederates. And I need not state the contrast between the needy confederacy and the abundance of Federal supplies and resources.

Now, sir, when the gentleman rises again to give breath to that effusion of unmitigated genius without fact to sustain it, in which he says—

And I here, before God, measuring my words, knowing their full extent and import, declare that neither the deeds of the Duke of Alva in the Low Countries, nor the massacre of Saint Bartholomew, nor the thumb-screws and engines of torture of the Spanish inquisition, begin to compare in atrocity with the hideous crime of Andersonville, let him add that the mortality at Andersonville and other confederate prisons falls short by more than 3 per cent. the mortality in Federal prisons.

Sir, if any man will reflect a moment he will see that there was reason why the confederate government should desire exchange of prisoners. It was scarce of food, pinched for clothing, closed up with a blockade of its ports; it needed troops; its ranks were thinning.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is proper that I should read one or two sentences from the man who has been arraigned as the vilest murderer in history. After the battles around Richmond, in which McClellan was defeated, some ten thousand prisoners fell into the hands of the confederacy. Victory had perched upon its standard, and the rejoicing naturally following victory was heard in the ranks of the confederate army. Mr. Davis went out to make a gratulatory speech. Now, gentlemen of the House, gentlemen of the other side, if you are willing to do justice, let me simply call your attention to the words of this man that then fell from his lips in the hour of victory. Speaking to the soldiers, he said:

You are fighting for all that is dearest to man; and, though opposed to a foe who disregards many of the usages of civilized war, your humanity to the wounded and the prisoners was a fit and crowning glory of your valor.

Above the victory, above every other consideration, even that victory which they believed insured protection to their homes and families, he tells them that at last their crowning glory was their humanity to the wounded and prisoners who had fallen into their hands.

The gentleman from Maine yesterday introduced the Richmond Examiner as a witness in his behalf. Now it is a rule of law that a man cannot impeach his own witness. It is true the Examiner hated Mr. Davis with a cordial hatred. The gentleman could not have introduced the testimony of perhaps a bitterer foe to Mr. Davis. Why did it hate him? Here are its reasons: "The chivalry and humanity of Jefferson Davis will inevitably ruin the confederacy." That is your witness, and the witness is worthy of your cause. You introduced the witness to prove Mr. Davis guilty of inhumanity, and he tells you that the humanity of Mr. Davis will ruin the confederacy. That is not all. In the same paper it says: "The enemy have gone from one unmanly cruelty to another." Recollect, this is your witness. "The enemy have gone from one unmanly cruelty to another. Encouraged by their impunity till they are now and have for some time been inflicting on the people of this country the worst horrors of barbarous and uncivilized war." Yet in spite of all this the Examiner alleged "Mr. Davis in his dealing with the enemy was as gentle as a sucking dove."

Mr. GARFIELD. What volume is that?

Mr. HILL. The same volume, page 531, and is taken from the Richmond Examiner—the paper the gentleman quoted from yesterday. And that is the truth. Those of us who were there at the time know it to be the fact. One of the persistent charges brought by that paper and some others against Mr. Davis was his humanity. Over and over again Mr. Davis has been heard to say, and I use his very language, when applied to to retaliate for the horrors inflicted upon our prisoners, "The inhumanity of the enemy to our prisoners can be no justification for a disregard by us of the rules of civilized war and of Christianity." Therefore he persisted in it, and this paper cried out against him that it would ruin the confederacy.

I am sure I owe this House an apology for having detained it so long; I shall detain it but a few moments longer. After all, what should men do who really desire the restoration of peace and to prevent the recurrence of the horrors of war? How ought they to look at this question? Sir, war is always horrible; war always brings hardships; it brings death, it brings sorrow, it brings ruin, it brings devastation. And he is unworthy to be called a statesman, looking to the pacification of this country, who will parade the horrors inseparable from war for the purpose of keeping up the strife that produced the war.

I do not doubt that I am the bearer of unwelcome messages to the gentleman from Maine and his party. He says that there are confederates in this body, and that they are going to combine with a few from the North for the purpose of controlling this Government. If one were to listen to the gentlemen on the other side he would be in doubt whether they rejoiced more when the South left the Union, or regretted most when the South came back to the Union that their fathers helped to form, and to which they will forever hereafter contribute as much of patriotic ardor, of noble devotion, and of willing sacrifice as the constituents of the gentleman from Maine. O, Mr. Speaker, why cannot gentlemen on the other side rise to the height of this great argument of patriotism? Is the bosom of the country always to be torn with this miserable sectional debate whenever a presidential election is pending? To that great debate of half a century before secession there were left no adjourned questions. The victory of the North was absolute, and God knows the submission of the South was complete. But, sir, we have recovered from the humiliation of defeat, and we come here among you and we ask you to give us the greetings accorded to brothers by brothers. We propose to join you in every patriotic endeavor and to unite with you in every patriotic aspiration that looks to the benefit, the advancement, and the honor of every part of our common country. Let us, gentlemen of all parties, in this centennial year indeed have a jubilee of freedom. We divide with you the glories of the Revolution and of the succeeding years of our national life before that unhappy division—that four years' night of gloom and despair—and so we shall divide with you the glories of all the future.

Sir, my message is this: There are no confederates in this House; there are now no confederates anywhere; there are no confederate schemes, ambitions, hopes, desires, or purposes here. But the South is here, and here she intends to remain. [Enthusiastic applause.] Go on and pass your qualifying acts, trample upon the Constitution you have sworn to support, abnegate the pledges of your fathers, incite rage upon our people, and multiply your infidelties until they shall be like the stars of heaven or the sands of the seashore, without number; but know this, for all your iniquities the South will never again seek a remedy in the madness of another secession. [Continued applause.] We are here; we are in the house of our fathers, our brothers are our companions, and we are at home to stay, thank God. [Much applause.]

We come to gratify no revenges, to retaliate no wrongs, to resent no past insults, to re-open no strife. We come with a patriotic purpose to do whatever in our political power shall lie to restore an honest, economical, and constitutional administration of the Government. We come charging upon the Union no wrongs to us. The Union never wronged us. The Union has been an unmixed blessing to every section, to every State, to every man of every color in America. We charge all our wrongs upon that "higher law" fanaticism, that never kept a pledge nor obeyed a law. The South did seek to leave the association of those who, she believed, would not keep fidelity to their covenants; the South sought to go to herself; but, so far from having lost our fidelity for the Constitution which our fathers made, when we sought to go we hugged that Constitution to our bosoms and carried it with us.

Brave Union men of the North, followers of Webster and Fillmore, of Clay and Cass, and Douglas—you who fought for the Union for the sake of the Union; you who ceased to fight when the battle ended and the sword was sheathed—we have no quarrel with you, whether republicans or democrats. We felt your heavy arm in the carnage of battle; but above the roar of the cannon we heard your voice of kindness, calling, "Brothers, come back!" And we bear witness to you this day that that voice of kindness did more to thin the confederate ranks and weaken the confederate arm than did all the artillery employed in the struggle. We are here to co-operate with you; to do whatever we can, in spite of all our sorrows, to rebuild the Union; to restore peace; to be a blessing to the country, and to make the American Union what our fathers intended it to be: the glory of America and a blessing to humanity.

But to you, gentlemen, who seek still to continue strife, and who, not satisfied with the sufferings already endured, the blood already shed, the waste already committed, insist that we shall be treated as criminals and oppressed as victims, only because we defended our convictions—to you we make no concessions. To you who followed up the war after the brave soldiers that fought it had made peace and gone to their homes—to you we have no concession to offer. Martyrs owe no apologies to tyrants. And while we are ready to make every sacrifice for the Union, even secession, however defeated and humbled, will confess no sin to fanaticism, however bigoted and exacting.

Yet, while we make to you no concession, we come even to you in no spirit of revenge. We would multiply blessings in common for you and for us. We have one ambition, and that is to add our political power to the patriotic Union men of the North in order to compel fanaticism to obey the law and live in the Union according to the Constitution. We do not propose to compel you by oaths, for you who breed strife only to get office and power will not keep oaths.

Sir, we did the Union one great wrong. The Union never wronged the South; but we of the South did to the Union one great wrong; and we come, as far as we can, to repair it. We wronged the Union grievously when we left it to be seized and rent and torn by the men who had denounced it as "a covenant with hell and a league with the devil." We ask you, gentlemen of the republican party, to rise above all your animosities. Forget your own sins. Let us unite to repair the evils that distract and oppress the country. Let us turn our backs upon the past, and let it be said in the future that he shall be the greatest patriot, the truest patriot, the noblest patriot who shall do most to repair the wrongs of the past and promote the glories of the future. [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

Mr. GARFIELD took the floor.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, which informed the House of the proceedings in that body upon the announcement of the death of Hon. ANDREW JOHNSON, late a Senator from the State of Tennessee.

DEATH OF ANDREW JOHNSON.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolutions just received from the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, unanimously, That the Senate has received with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. ANDREW JOHNSON, late a Senator of the United States from the State of Tennessee.

Resolved, unanimously, That as a mark of respect for the memory of Mr. JOHNSON the members of the Senate will go into mourning by wearing crape upon the left arm for thirty days.

Resolved, unanimously, That as an additional mark of respect for the memory of Mr. JOHNSON the Senate do now adjourn.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. Speaker, the duty devolves on me, as the Representative of the first congressional district of Tennessee, to announce to the House the death of a distinguished citizen of Tennessee, whose home, from his first appearance in that State in 1826 to the day of his death, was in the congressional district I have the honor to represent in this House. I allude to the death of Hon. ANDREW JOHNSON, late a Senator from Tennessee, Ex-President of the United States, and for ten years a member of this House, which occurred at the residence of his daughter, Mrs. Brown, in Carter County, Tennessee, on the morning of the 31st of July last.

Mr. JOHNSON was called to his final account and closed his connection with time and earthly things without that protracted sickness and suffering which gives premonition of approaching dissolution. He was stricken with paralysis a day or two previous to his death, and almost as soon as his sickness was known the melancholy tidings were flashed to the most distant parts of our country that ANDREW JOHNSON was dead. Not to our country only, but to the whole civilized world abroad, was the sad intelligence carried with lightning speed that the "Great Commoner" was no more.

His remains were interred on a lofty eminence west of the town of Greeneville, a spot selected by himself, commanding an extended view of the surrounding country, and there amid those mountain heights all that is mortal of ANDREW JOHNSON is crumbling into dust. The voice that has been so often heard in this Chamber is silenced forever. The form that was so familiar in these Halls has disappeared, and will be seen no more. Shrouded in the flag of his country, beneath the shadow of which he fought the great political battles of his life, and whose triumphant folds were ever to him an object of adoration which he worshiped with an unswerving devotion, far from the din and strife and turmoil of the outer world he quietly sleeps that last, long, peaceful sleep which knows no waking.

ANDREW JOHNSON'S career as a public man is the most remarkable and wonderful in all our history, and is perhaps unprecedented in modern times. It cannot be expected in the few brief remarks we are to submit to the House now that justice can be done to Mr. JOHNSON'S public life, or that we can take more than a glance at a few of the prominent facts in his history.

Mr. JOHNSON was born in Raleigh, North Carolina, on the 29th day of December, 1808. His father died when he was a child, leaving the future statesman to the care of a widowed mother in poverty and obscurity. At ten years of age he was apprenticed to a tailor in his native town. He was then unable to read, and his first efforts to learn were made during this apprenticeship. A gentleman read to him some sketches from an old book known as "The American Speaker." These extracts aroused the attention of the poor apprentice and first fired his ambition. He determined and did learn to read them for himself. That book was presented to him, and is still preserved in the library of Mr. JOHNSON.

In the fall of the year 1826, on the evening of a dark, gloomy day, a two-wheeled cart, drawn by a blind pony, was driven into the village of Greeneville, East Tennessee, from the direction of the mountains of North Carolina. With it were two men and a woman. The younger of the two, who drove the pony, stopped at the house of a citizen whose sons are now living in that town, and asked for forage to feed his horse, which he procured, and then inquired for suitable camping-ground for the night to which he drove and encamped, near where now stands the mansion of the Johnson family. In a little less than forty years from that night that homeless wanderer, then about eighteen years of age, shrouded in obscurity and poverty, a stranger in a strange land, without the rudiments of a common education, camping out under the broad canopy of the heavens in the village of Greeneville, became the occupant of the building at the far end of this avenue, and the chief executive officer of a great confederacy of States numbering 40,000,000 of people! That youth was ANDREW JOHNSON. Such was his first appearance in Tennessee, and thus the first night ANDREW JOHNSON passed in Greeneville, which became his future home.

Mr. JOHNSON established himself in business as a tailor. By his industry, energy, unswerving integrity, and promptness he was successful. As a mechanic, that fidelity to duty and unquestioned honesty which characterized him in every period of his history won for him the confidence and respect of the people, and made him, even then, a power in the community. He was married shortly after he settled in Greeneville, where his widow survives him. She taught him to write; she aided him by her intelligence and instruction in his efforts to acquire the rudiments of an education, and thus laid the foundation of his future greatness. Conscious of his powers and with unfaltering confidence in himself, identified in interest and sympathy with the laboring masses, he applied himself with untiring industry, under disadvantages of a most extraordinary character, to the acquisition of an education and to preparation for his future wonderful career.

In 1828 he was elected an alderman of the village; was re-elected in 1829 and 1830; and was elected to the office of mayor in 1830. He was appointed a trustee of Rhea Academy about 1831; was a member of the lower house of the Tennessee Legislature in 1835. Being defeated in 1837, he was re-elected in 1839. He was elected State senator in 1841, and a member of this House in 1843, to which position he was re-elected for the four succeeding terms. He was elected governor of Tennessee in 1853, re-elected in 1855, and in 1857 was chosen as a Senator in Congress from the State of Tennessee for the term ending March 3, 1863; was appointed military governor of Tennessee during the late civil war in 1862; was a candidate for Vice-President on the ticket with Mr. Lincoln in 1864, to which office he was elected, and by an event never to be forgotten in the history of the country Mr. JOHNSON, on the 15th of April, 1865, became President of the United States.

Of the events of Mr. JOHNSON'S administration I shall not speak. The history of his administration is now part of the history of the country. Posterity will do him justice. The great statesmen of the past have been called to the administration of public affairs in times of peace, when the ship of state was sailing over a calm, unruffled sea. Mr. JOHNSON took the helm in the midst of a storm lashed into fury unprecedented in the history of our country by the angry passions, the bitterness, and strife of a long and bloody civil conflict. To say that he committed no errors would be to say that he was more than human. Now that he has passed away none can gainsay the honesty and integrity of ANDREW JOHNSON, or doubt his unfaltering fidelity to the great principle of constitutional liberty.

After the close of his term as President, in 1869, Mr. JOHNSON returned to his home in Tennessee. He became a candidate for Senator, but was defeated. In 1872, at the demand of a large number of his people, he became a candidate for Congress from the State at large, but was for the third time in the whole course of his public life again defeated. In January, 1875, at the demand of the people, he was elected by the Legislature of Tennessee a Senator in Congress for six years. His last and only appearance in that body after his election was at the extra session in March, 1875, and with the close of that session terminated ANDREW JOHNSON'S public services.

Such is a brief statement of the public positions held by Mr. JOHNSON. He was continuously in the public service for almost forty years.

It may be well said that his career was the most wonderful in our history. Who, indeed, was ever like him? Who ever, as he did, proved his honesty, his aims, and his ambitions by conquering for them their indisputable vindication? Taking the history of the three-score and seven years of ANDREW JOHNSON, the poverty of his childhood, the neglect of his youth, his humble origin, his growth to manhood without even the rudiments of education, his humble mechanical pursuit, and then looking to his subsequent remarkable career, and we have the outlines of a great man struggling against misfortune, battling against fate, with bitter opposition at every step of his progress, finally conquering every adverse element, and at last elevating himself to the highest position in the Republic.

The poor, uneducated youth became a Senator in Congress, the governor of a great State, and the Chief Executive of a proud nation; and, dying, has embalmed his memory in the grateful hearts of millions of his countrymen; and, though his form has disappeared, ANDREW JOHNSON lives and will ever live in the affections of the people while the principles of constitutional liberty are cherished, and honesty, integrity, and patriotism, and abilities of the highest order are venerated by men. Of him it may be said

> These shall resist the empire of decay
> When Time is o'er and worlds have passed away;
> Cold in the dust the perish'd heart may lie,
> But that which warmed it once can never die.

ANDREW JOHNSON was but a man; he had his faults; he committed errors; but, looking to the unfavorable circumstances by which his youth was surrounded, the bitter and continuous political battles in which he was engaged from early life down to his death, the wonder is that he committed so few.

He had his enemies, and his life and history furnish most striking evidence of the truth of the poet's sentiment:

> He who ascends to mountain tops shall find
> The loftiest peaks most wrapt in clouds and snow;
> He who surpasses or subdues mankind
> Must look down on the hate of those below.
> Though high above the sun of glory glow,
> And far beneath the earth and ocean spread,
> Round him are icy rocks, and loudly blow
> Contending tempests on his naked head,
> And thus reward the toils which to those summits led.

But Mr. JOHNSON had his friends and admirers, who adhered to him through every vicissitude of his political fortunes, and with the laboring masses of the people of the country perhaps no public man of his day had more influence and power than did he. He was one of them; knew their wants, and sympathized with their struggles.

The life of ANDREW JOHNSON is an example of the lasting fame that surely awaits the honest statesman. His unswerving integrity; his bold, independent, and candid declaration of his opinion on public questions; his confidence in the people, and the absence of disguise in all his acts were his master-key to the popular heart. The country was never in doubt as to his opinions and purposes, and, victorious or defeated, he remained firm in his belief. In all the contests of his time his position on great public questions was as clear as the sun in a cloudless sky.

Sirs, standing by the grave of ANDREW JOHNSON, and looking back over the history of his life and considering these things, how insignificant and contemptible appear the labor and ambition of the mere politician! What a reproach is his life on that false policy which would trifle with a great people! If I were to write the epitaph of ANDREW JOHNSON, I would inscribe on the stone which shall mark his resting-place, as the highest eulogy, "Here lies the man who was in the public service for forty years, who never tried to deceive his countrymen, and died, as he lived, 'an honest man, the noblest work of God.'" While the youth of America should imitate his noble qualities, they may take courage from his example, and note the high proof it affords that under our equal institutions the avenues to the highest position are open alike to all.

Mr. JOHNSON rose by the force of his own genius, indomitable will, and untiring energy, unaided by power, prestige, or wealth. At an age when our young men are usually in pursuit of education at institutions of learning, he, in ignorance and poverty, made his way from the "Old North State" toward the West, and, amid the rude collisions incident to East Tennessee at that day, commenced his early struggle, and in less than fifty years matured a character the highest exhibitions of which were destined to mark eras in his country's history. Beginning in the mountains of East Tennessee in 1826, brought into antagonism with the power, influence, and wealth of old citizens of the country, supported by the consciousness of his own powers and by the confidence of the people, he surmounted all the barriers of adverse fortune and won a glorious name in the annals of his country.

Let the generous youth fired with an honorable ambition remember that our American system of government offers on every hand and opens wide the doors to the most exalted position and the grandest reward to merit. If, like ANDREW JOHNSON, orphanage, obscurity, and poverty shall oppress him; yet, if like him, he feels the Promethean spark within, let him remember that his country, like a generous mother, opens wide her arms to welcome every one of her children whose genius may promote her prosperity or add to her renown. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolutions:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives of the United States has received with the deepest sensibility and profound sorrow the intelligence of the death of Hon. ANDREW JOHNSON, late a Senator from the State of Tennessee, ex-President of the United States and long a member of this House.

Resolved, That the proceedings of this House in relation to the death of Hon. ANDREW JOHNSON be communicated to the widow and family of the deceased by the Clerk of this House.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect for the memory of the deceased this House do now adjourn.

Mr. WADDELL. I have been struck since these proceedings commenced with the peculiar circumstances of this occasion. There is to a man who believes in special providences food for reflection in the fact that just as we have reached the climacteric of a debate upon the question whether the American people shall live together as brothers, whether there shall be a Government of love or hate, we are suddenly arrested by the remembrance that there is a time appointed for all men once to die. Mr. Speaker, when that supreme hour comes for you and me and for each of us, I know nothing will give us more consolation than the memory of deeds of charity and good-will.

The very remarkable man whose death has just been formally announced to this House was, like many other men who obtained eminence in other States, a native and, until his early manhood, a resident of North Carolina. It is therefore meet, sir, that in this hour dedicated to his memory the voice of that State should be heard, and the duty of uttering it has been assigned to me.

My personal acquaintance with Mr. JOHNSON was very limited and merely formal. I will not therefore undertake to portray his character as a private citizen, nor shall I attempt any sketch of his public life and his varied and distinguished public services, because that has been already done by my friend who has just taken his seat, and is familiar to all more or less.

But he exhibited throughout his public career some qualities upon which brief comment may justly be made, and perhaps not unprofitably at this time. His education, socially and politically, differed in almost every respect from my own. Indeed I might say they were almost antipodal, and never until his memorable struggle, when President, for the preservation of constitutional liberty, as I believe, had any portion of his career attracted my sympathy. But aside from the characteristics which he developed in that struggle he exhibited certain virtues as a public man which must always command respect and admiration—virtues which, if they are not rare nowadays, are certainly not the commonest attributes of those who occupy distinguished station.

Mr. JOHNSON was an honest man, a truthful man, and incorruptible. He obstinately adhered to the opinion which ought to be, but is not, universally accepted and acted upon, that personal integrity and political dishonesty are absolutely irreconcilable in the same person. In all the bitter contests through which he passed, (and his career in this respect is almost without a parallel,) his worst enemy, so far as I know, never attempted to prove, if he ever charged, that ANDREW JOHNSON was a corrupt man.

Whatever his faults, or vices, if you please—and, I presume, like all other men, he had his full share of them—he unquestionably had intense convictions, to which he clung with fearless devotion and for which he battled with manly courage. Among these, sir, none were more conspicuous than his faith in the doctrines of the fathers touching the limitations of the Constitution and his firm belief in the maxim that purity of administration is essential to the life of free government.

If his almost fanatical love of the Union caused him at times to assent to the use of arbitrary power, he still always proclaimed the supremacy of the Constitution. If corruption in administration occurred during his presidency, no one ever accused him of being even remotely connected with it. He at least understood the principles and sympathized with the spirit of republican institutions. He did not think that personal comfort and pecuniary benefit were the chief ends to be aimed at in seeking public offices. He did not accept them at the hands of his countrymen as a debt due to him and did not administer them, as small men always do, in accordance with his personal feelings and interests. He considered himself the servant of the people, bound by his oath to be careful and diligent in looking out, not for his own, but for their interests. He never was one of those who were called, and aptly called in the civil-service commission report, "the banditti of politics and the pawnbrokers of patronage."

He may not have been a broad-minded statesman, in the ordinary acceptation of that term, but it is to be remembered that in his youth there was no opportunity afforded him for broad culture, and that he did not even have a patron to secure for him education at the public expense. He certainly was not a classical scholar. It would seem that he did not even know what nepos meant and was utterly insensible to the charm that lies hidden behind the words dona ferentes. But in practical ability, in power as a debater, whether before popular assemblies or legislative assemblies, and in extensive information in the domain of politics, he was by no means deficient. His long and active public service in association with some of the wisest and ablest statesmen of this land, improved, enlarged, and liberalized his naturally powerful intellect to a degree which may perhaps justify his assignment to a place among the ablest of our Chief Magistrates, and certainly to one very far above some of them.

After his death some pious investigator, I believe, claimed to have discovered that he was an infidel. I have very good evidence to disprove that; but while personally I know not how that may have been, I do know that while he was alive and in office he was too good a patriot to seek to excite a religious persecution against any portion of his fellow-citizens. If he had religious views of any kind, it is safe to say that they were his own, and were arrived at after mature deliberation and reflection; but whatever they were, sir, he never sought to make political capital out of them.

Mr. Speaker, ANDREW JOHNSON has gone to his long rest, as sooner or later each and all of us must go. After a long and laborious career, begun in poverty, ignorance, and friendlessness, but crowned throughout its course with earthly honors, he now confronts the mysteries of eternity. It may possibly be some consolation to his friends to believe that if for his deeds done in the body he be impeached in his new state of existence, he will at least have angels for his prosecutors, and the Merciful One for his judge. That is the only consolation that is left to any of us in contemplating the events of a future life.

I do not hold up Mr. JOHNSON as an exemplar either in morals or in politics. Very few are the men to whom I could pay that tribute. But, sir, the qualities which I have ascribed to him, and which he possessed, may well be emulated by some of his contemporaries upon whom fortune or an inscrutable Providence has devolved the duties and responsibilities of public office. Upon many of them have more brilliant gifts been bestowed. They have been more learned, more eloquent, more popular, than he. But not of every one of them can it be said, as of him, he was honest, he was truthful, he was incorruptible. These are traits, sir, which his native State of North Carolina will never cease to honor in any American statesman, whether born within her borders or not. And therefore, as a tribute to them, as developed in ANDREW JOHNSON, she now lays her wreath upon his tomb.

Mr. THORNBURGH. Mr. Speaker, representing in part that section of the State of Tennessee which was the home of ANDREW JOHNSON, I desire to express my respect for his character and veneration for his memory. My colleague has mentioned the incidents of the early life and the long public career of ANDREW JOHNSON with an interesting completeness that renders unnecessary further recital. Yet an expression of sorrow for his loss, and appreciation for the great virtues he, as a man and a statesman, possessed, cannot be inappropriate, coming from one who, though differing upon political questions, enjoyed his friendship from childhood.

My earliest recollection of political contests and public discussions is connected with the conflicts and triumphs which so characterized his history. There was a period of his life when I had almost daily opportunities to study his character and observe the manner in which he performed important and arduous duties that devolved upon him. This was when Mr. JOHNSON was military governor of Tennessee. It was the stormiest day of our national history. The country was in the midst of civil war, and there are few of us here who have forgotten what civil war means. In this important and responsible position he exhibited many of those great qualities which made him a fit ruler in times of disorder and turbulence. He was fertile in resources, zealous, earnest, and faithful. There were no precedents to guide him in the arduous duties of his office. His vigorous mind, resolute purpose, strong will, were necessary in the work required, while that work itself illustrated his love of justice, his courage, energy, and patriotism. War had almost obliterated all traces of government in Tennessee. The State was a chaos, out of which he was to bring order. The desolation of contending armies made it necessary for him to create supplies, house the homeless, clothe the naked, feed the poor. The courts were closed to the redress of grievances, and justice was to be administered by him. Thousands of Union people flocked to him, begging for supplies and arms. And yet he proved equal to the task before him. He was civil chief magistrate, a general, judge, and quartermaster, and a benefactor of the poor. He worked with constant, tireless energy, bringing order out of confusion, re-instating the courts of justice, redressed grievances, and fed, sheltered, and clothed the homeless poor, without regard to the Army in which their natural protectors might be found. From the Union men around him he raised an army and sent them to the field, where they did gallant service for the Government; and when the capture of his capital was threatened, he refused to abandon it with our retreating Army, but, stern and unfaltering, stood a bulwark for its defense.

But all this has become a part of the history of the country. ANDREW JOHNSON never faltered in his devotion to the Union. With unsurpassed earnestness he devoted every faculty of body and mind to a successful re-establishment of a united republic, looking forward anxiously to the hour when he could bring his State back into the Union and could see her star once more emblazoned on his country's banner. The most notable features in ANDREW JOHNSON'S life and character were his humble origin, his utter want of early education, his faithful devotion to the principles he espoused, his great courage and indomitable will. To these circumstances in his history and these traits in his character can be traced, in my opinion, the two most important events in his life. Without these characteristics he might not have stood on the floor of the Senate the solitary representative from the seceding States, and have made that memorable speech on the 27th of July, 1861, which was so full of the deepest political research and the most thorough and unselfish patriotism. Starting with the maxim that "Salus republicæ suprema lex," he said:

> The time has come when the Government should put forth its entire power and sustain the supremacy of the Constitution and laws made in pursuance thereof. If we have no government, let the delusion be dispelled, let the dream pass away, and let the people of the United States and the nations of the earth know at once we have no government. If we have a government based on the intelligence and virtue of the American people, let that great fact be now established; and when once established, this Government will be on a more enduring and permanent basis than it ever was before. I still have confidence in the integrity, the virtue, the intelligence, and the patriotism of the great mass of the people; and so believing, I intend to stand by the Government of my fathers to the last extremity.

Sentiments like these, coming at that peculiar crisis in the country's history from a Southern Senator, re-echoed through the land, and gave rebuke to those who could find no power in the Constitution for national self-preservation, and infused new confidence and courage to those preparing for the great conflict that was so soon to follow.

But while ANDREW JOHNSON was resolute in war, no sooner had the echoes of the last battle died away than he became an earnest advocate of a re-united people. He sought to bury all past animosities, and to cultivate the nobler feelings of kindness, forgiveness, and fraternal love. Few men in history could have held the reigns of government as its chief executive at that time, when human passions had become inflamed by the memories of this recent terrible war, and have determined the novel and anomalous questions presented without encountering the antagonism of some leading statesmen, and inviting that bitter denunciation of calumny and villification which now seems to be visited upon all who have attained to exalted position, and who have rendered great services to their country and to mankind. His marked individuality, great tenacity of purpose, and iron will, brought him his full measure of honest opposition and malignant aspersion. But even the genius of slander itself had not the audacity to charge ANDREW JOHNSON with dishonesty in any act of his long and eventful public life.

I shall leave it for others, his contemporaries and associates, to speak more in detail of his career while in the two Houses of Congress and while President of the nation.

A great leader of the people, an orator possessing peculiar power to inspire, persuade, convince, and control the honest masses of the country, has passed the opening portals of the grave, and none feel his loss more keenly or lament his death more sincerely than the humbler classes, from whose ranks he sprang and whose peculiar champion he never ceased to be. His dust now mingles with that of Jackson and Polk in the bosom of Tennessee. Peace to his ashes, honor to his memory.

Let him rest; it is not often
That his soul hath known repose;
Let him rest; they rest but seldom
Whose successes challenge foes.
He was weary, worn with watching,
His life-crown of power hath pressed
Oft on temples sadly aching—
He was weary, let him rest.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, in this age of the world the development and character of the individual man is the result of generations of human growth. The victories of the warrior, the achievements of the statesman, and the fanciful creations of the poet are made possible by the existing conditions of society, and are so evoked from and commingled with the innumerable circumstances of human progress as to render it uncertain to what extent they originate in the individual intellect and will, and how far they are the result of myriad unseen agencies.

In the dawn of human existence man, himself a new-wrought miracle, without revelation or tradition, wandered amid the marvels of a new creation to wonder, admire, and adore. We can scarcely realize through what centuries he must have passed from that primitive period of child-like simplicity and instinctive adoration, through the slow development of the idea of the heroic, the beautiful, the religious, and the practical, until he could comprehend the laws of the physical and intellectual world, and tower among millions of the human race the type and representative of the marvelous civilization of the nineteenth century! Every age has marked man's progress, and every great advance in mental and moral culture has had some typical representative of the aggregate development of his social and moral attributes.

On this occasion we pause for a moment in the busy avocations of life to pay the tribute of our respect to the memory of one of our distinguished compeers, who, having exemplified almost every vicissitude of earthly fortune, having attained the highest place of power, and having afterward entered upon a pathway untrodden by any predecessor, has obeyed the inexorable mandate—to rest from his labors on earth.

I have thought, sir, while other gentlemen portrayed his life and character more accurately and eloquently than I have the ability to do, it might not be inappropriate for me to refer to some peculiarities in the life and character of this distinguished citizen which illustrate conditions of fortune that could only exist in American civilization and under American institutions.

Sir, I have believed from early youth, with emotions of pride and gratitude which I have no language to express, that we live in an age and are citizens of a country whose laws, policy, and free institutions, in their true intention and result, opened to every child of the Republic alike the royal road to education, culture, distinction, and honor—the royal highway that leads to everything and all things that are garnered in our grand inheritance of freedom to which the immortal soul might honorably aspire, across which arrogance should build no barricade and ignorance no trench; where wealth should never jostle the poor nor pride override the humble; where virtue might pass with fearless step and devotion might worship at every way-side shrine!

With such reflections, Mr. Speaker, I commend to my countrymen the study of the life and character of ANDREW JOHNSON as illustrating more distinctly than any other example which now occurs to my memory the spirit, the tendencies, and the possibilities of American institutions.

Neither the occasion nor my own inclination will permit more than a brief reference; but the American citizen may inquire with pride, Where else could the child of poverty and ignorance, under like circumstances, have risen to the highest honors of the State? In what other land and under what other civilization could woman have become at once the wife and the teacher of the wandering mechanic, and, accompanying and encouraging his upward progress to honor and power, could have imparted to her daughters such delicate culture and gentle training, that even amid the splendors of the capital and the throngs of beauty they could disarm envy by their virtues and excite admiration by their simplicity?

Under what other division of power between the General Government, the States, and the people could the subject of an impeachment and prosecution the most remarkable and determined ever witnessed in our land have undergone so fiery an ordeal, and afterward so far commanded the respect of political friends and foes that his return to the Senate should meet with general approval?

That he was gifted with remarkable powers none will deny. With a strong intellect, untiring industry, an indomitable will, and an ambition that gathered intensity alike from defeat and success; with little of that personal sympathy which could control the multitude by its electric influence, and with a directness and obstinacy arising in part from physical organization, but more from the mental habitudes peculiar to the varied circumstances of his condition, his life exhibits a greater variety of the phases of character that spread all the way from unworthy littleness to moral grandeur than that of any other statesman whose name illustrates American history.

He was considerate in his friendships, vindictive in his enmities, unforgiving of injury, but moderate in victory. With a blunt honesty of purpose and acknowledged integrity of character, he marshaled his forces, and controlled the situation more through an involuntary respect and an undefined fear than from personal favor and affection.

Remembering his early life, he was ever the friend of the poor, from whose ranks he had risen, yet lacked the loftiness of soul which would have prevented his taking an unworthy pride in humbling the pretensions of wealth and the ostentation of birth.

His zeal for the homeless and landless poor never flagged, and his indomitable love of the Union and struggles for the perpetuity of free institutions challenge the admiration of the world; and even his ceaseless reiterations of his love of the Constitution, although exciting the ridicule of political opponents, were in harmony with his life-long actions and professions.

Sir, there were occasions in his life, rendered sublime by his heroic courage and indomitable zeal for the honor, the Union, and the Constitution of his country, which history will emblazon upon its pages; and when the prejudices and passions of the hour shall have passed away, posterity will inscribe them upon his monument.

Even-handed justice will attribute his foibles and faults to his early struggles with poverty and toil, the imperfection of early culture and education, and to the anomalous condition of the social organization in the midst of which he lived; while the memory of his countrymen will linger around those nobler manifestations of his courage and patriotism in preserving those glorious institutions that invited him from the depths of ignorance and want to the high places of usefulness and honor.

His illustrious example will quicken the genius and stimulate the energy of ten thousand children of poverty and toil to strive for higher culture and search for nobler fields of usefulness and honor, and it may admonish the patriot and statesman, with renewed emphasis, that in the more perfect education and virtue of all the people lies the only safe reliance for the perpetuity of our free institutions and the future glory of our country.

Sir, there are nobler things in life than wealth and power; there are far richer treasures for the citizen than lie hidden in the mine, for neither the vast outlines of our domain nor the illimitable wealth within its borders, neither the grandeur of our encircling mountains nor the beauty of our silver streams, neither rapidly multiplying States, populous cities, nor the unrivaled expanse of rural cultivation, can awaken in the breast such emotions of pride and patriotism as the unfaltering belief that through all and over all this glorious land are established such laws and such institutions as will preserve forever, as the irreversible inheritance of the American people, "the absolute equality of manhood and the universal enjoyment of equal rights."

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, in the hour of grief, in the ministrations of affliction, when the sable drapery of mourning is drawn in heavy folds around us and the mind is overshadowed with gloom, silence is sometimes more eloquent and impressive than the chaste rhetoric of the scholar or the flowing declamation of the orator.

In the ceremonies of sorrow, in the expressions of regret and honor to the dead, the downcast face and drooping eye sometimes speak the emotions of the heart in language more touching and truthful than the studied and polished utterances of the eulogist or the glowing phrases clothed in the beautiful imagery of the poet.

After what has been so fittingly and eloquently said by my colleagues who have just spoken, I might with propriety keep my place among the silent spectators of these solemn and impressive ceremonies without by speaking incurring the risk of detracting aught from the beauty of the tributes which they have offered to the memory and public services of the distinguished citizen of our State whose death has just been formally announced to this body; and, indeed, I should have stood reverently, sadly, but in silence before the altar of the people's sorrow, this day unveiled in the council chamber of the nation, but for the reason that had I done so I should not have reflected the wishes nor met the expectations of a large number of those who clothed me with the honors of an American legislator and sent me here to speak in their name.

But in the little which I shall say expressive of their and my own estimate of the character of the distinguished man whose fortunes they followed with equal courage in the gloom of defeat and the brightness of success, I shall not exaggerate his virtues by the extravagant laudations of the friendly eulogist, nor unveil his faults with the hostile hand of the carping critic. The one is the task of the orator upon the rostrum, the poet in song, and the enthusiast in history, while the other is the congenial work of those who forget the good, and remember only the evil that men do, and never learn to cast the mantle of charity even over the graves of those with whom they have struggled in life.

Of great men, whether living or dead, the truth may be fitly spoken. The scales in which their character is weighed may be held with an impartial hand, no matter whether good or evil disturb the equal poise.

ANDREW JOHNSON when living was not wont to shrink from any combat, nor quail before any foe; and now that he is dead, and the story of his checkered life is passing into history, there is perhaps but little cause to invoke the eulogy of his friends or to supplicate the forbearance of his enemies. To say that he was a perfect man, that no fault marred the symmetry of his character, that no error of action, no weakness or vice of nature dimmed the lustre of his fame, would be to raise him above the level of humanity and clothe him with attributes not found in the history of mankind. But as the purest gold is alloyed with baser metal, as some ingrain flaw dims the sparkling light of the rarest jewel, so the fame of the most exalted human character is shadowed by some human frailty.

The page upon which the future historian shall record the career and achievements of ANDREW JOHNSON will be fraught with deeper interest to the thoughtful mind than almost any other in the great volume of American history. The story of his life from the time he laid aside the implements of the humble artisan through all the gradations of political preferment until the day, only a little while ago, when he was laid in the grave, is a record of bold conception, high aims, grand struggles, and marvelous triumphs.

To relate his struggles and his successes, his combats and his victories, would fill the pages of many volumes; to even group together without comment the grander and more dramatic events of his wonderful career, from the humble work-shop of the country village to the stately mansion of the nation's rulers, would extend my remarks beyond the limits fixed by the proprieties of this occasion.

Reaching the period of manhood and entering upon the journey of life without fortune or friends, unlearned in the lore of books, not even acquainted with the simple characters which make their silent pages speak the thoughts of others and reveal to the mind the rich treasures of human learning, he grappled with and overcame these obstacles to greatness with the same tireless energy and persistent courage which he brought to the accomplishment of every undertaking of his future life.

Endowed by nature with a manhood that knew no fear, an energy that knew no rest, a mind original and unique in its cast, which no system of ethics, no school of learning could fetter or control, his character stands among the figures of American history without a model, grand and striking as the rugged mountains which girdle his beautiful Tennessee home.

In no country on earth, save in this land of free speech, free thought, and free institutions, could there have been such a career as ANDREW JOHNSON'S. Making his first appearance as a legislator and representative of the people in the village council and then as a delegate to the Legislature of his State, he evinced at that early period the same inflexible integrity, stern devotion to duty, and strict adherence to the delegated powers of a public servant which governed him in his future political life.

Growing in public favor and recognized by the people as the champion of their rights, the fearless defender of their interests, he was elected a member of the national Congress, and then scarcely known, save by the sturdy yeomenry that dwelt among the mountains and in the green valleys of East Tennessee, he entered this hall and took his place among the counselors of the nation. Here he found a fitting field for the exercise of those wonderful powers with which nature had gifted him; here he entered an arena in which he could display all the prowess of the mighty athlete which he was soon to become.

Elected chief magistrate of his State, he filled the seat once held by a Sevier, a Carroll, and a Polk, with an ability equal to his illustrious predecessors, and reflected renewed honor upon the great Commonwealth over which he presided.

Fortune still smiling upon her chosen favorite, he was elected by the Legislature of Tennessee a Senator in the Congress of the nation, where he grappled in equal combat with the great orators and statesmen who then composed that august body.

Still moving onward in the fulfillment of the high destiny allotted him by nature, he was called by the voice of the people to the second highest office in their gift; and before its mantle had scarcely been adjusted the providence of God placed in his hand the scepter wielded by the chief ruler of our great Republic.

This brief sketch of a single character, this short story, so plainly told, of a single life, covers events so strange and developments so startling, one might well suppose that the hand of the romancer had seized the pen of the historian and written upon a page swept by the wand of the magician. The unlettered youth, the country rustic, becoming by his own unaided exertions a polished orator, a learned legislator, a great leader of the people, and finally the ruler of his nation, presents a picture seldom drawn by the pen of the sober historian.

The name of ANDREW JOHNSON will go into history coupled with the great events which attracted the interest and attention of mankind during the age in which he lived.

Many of his public acts, as well as the general tenor of his life, endeared him in a peculiar manner to the hearts of the people, the humble masses of his countrymen. They followed and trusted him with a confidence and affection rarely ever accorded before to an American politician, and in the strength of their devotion and exuberance of their enthusiasm they crowned him the people's sovereign.

Early in his public career, there sprang into existence, as the offering and product of that restless spirit which has always pervaded American politics, ever seeking changes and innovations, a party organization teaching hostility to a large class of our people, and making the character of their religion, and the place of their birth the test of political preferment. Gathering strength by the novelty of its teachings, and crossing the border of surrounding States, it was spreading over Tennessee like a rushing wave, sweeping away all opposition, until it met in ANDREW JOHNSON a stern, relentless foe, under whose stalwart blows it was shattered to atoms, and it now only lives in the history of the past.

No marvel, then, that every man of foreign birth, who has found a home upon American soil, shelter and protection under the broad banner of our free government, honors and reveres the name and memory of the enlightened statesman, the bold and generous champion who battled so gallantly to maintain for them the rights of American citizenship.

Identified with the people in all their feelings and sympathies, having an intuitive perception of their wants and interests, he was ever active in the furtherance of those measures of legislation peculiarly calculated for the protection of their rights and the advancement of their happiness.

While his unbending will and strong combative nature made him smite rudely and wrestle fiercely with rival leaders whom he encountered, sometimes bringing upon him the enmity of the great and the powerful, yet the weak and defenceless were always his friends.

Studying profoundly our theory of government, so congenial to his nature and instinctive convictions, he became one among the ablest expounders of that palladium of our liberties, the safeguard of our rights, the Constitution of our country. To this, as he construed it, he adhered with unyielding firmness during all his long official life; by this he was guided in all his public actions. That which fell short of its requirements or went beyond its limits received from him no mild rebuke, no gentle touch, but was the signal of instant combat.

Once fixed in his convictions he followed them with an energy that never relaxed, an industry that never tired, a vigilance that never slept, and a courage that never faltered or deserted him.

In the great historical events which transpired during his busy, eventful life his nature rose to the dignity of the occasion, and in all the changing vicissitudes of his career he lost none of that fixedness of purpose and persistency of will which carried him over so many obstacles, from the obscurity of the village artisan to the world-wide fame of the great commoner.

Whether basking in the sunshine of popular favor as the idol of the hour or battling against the storm of party proscription, he remained steadfast in his faith of the final triumph of the principles for which he contended, the measures which he advocated.

When the folly and madness of the American people had culminated in a fierce storm of civil war; when millions of armed men rushed to battle; when our whole social and political structure reeled and trembled in the terrible convulsion, he had the firmness to resist the entreaties of his friends, the allurements of the highest ambition which their partiality could have gratified, and to pursue the convictions which led him in a different direction.

When, in the heat of partisan zeal, before the quiet dignity of the statesman and the calm reflection of the patriot had taken the place of the frenzied passions and vindictive enmities engendered by the war, he was arraigned for trial before hostile judges, charged with a violation of that instrument which he had made the study and guide of his life, here he appalled his accusers and won the plaudits of the world by a dignity and moral grandeur of deportment that might have saved Charles of England from the scaffold and a monarch of France from dying by the guillotine.

Firm and unbending before the fickle storm of public opinion, which was for the time beating against him, and making no effort to change its current, he retired from his high office with the dignity of a Roman senator and the unpretending patriotism of a Cincinnatus, and returned to the home in the mountains from which he had so often been called by the voice of the people.

He presented the spectacle—all too rare in modern history—of a man spending an entire life-time in his country's service, filling the highest station in its gift, holding in some measure both its purse and its sword, going back in the evening of his days to private life poorer than most of those who give only ordinary talents to the usual avocations of life.

No bribe ever found its way into his hand; no corruption ever stained his record; and it was the pride of his life, the boast of his friends, that even his enemies have borne willing testimony to the purity of his private and the honesty of his public life.

It is yet too soon to write impartially the history of this remarkable man. His combats are too recent; too many of the foemen with whom he contended are still living; the blows he dealt are yet too keenly felt. The snows of a single winter have not yet fallen upon his new-made grave in the village church-yard. In it let him rest until a future generation, unbiased by the friendship or enmity of the present, shall sit in judgment upon his actions and accord him that place in history to which he shall be entitled.

The thoughts, feelings, and aspirations which have occupied great minds in life have sometimes been the burden of their last whisper as they were being forever enveloped in the gathering shadows of death.

When the great Napoleon lay dying in exile, long after his splendid career had closed, his mind wandered back to the days of his glory, when he was the leader of those invincible armies whose marches over Europe were lighted with the constant blaze of victory: he whispered with failing breath the same martial words which had rung over so many fields of battle.

When the great English admiral, the heroic Nelson, had fought his last fight, had won his last great victory, and was being borne bleeding, dying, from the bloody deck, he uttered those words which have gone into history and been inscribed beside his name high up upon the roll of naval heroes.

ANDREW JOHNSON, when about to step across the narrow stream which divides us from the broad ocean of eternity which spreads out beyond, when the sound of its rushing waters was falling upon his ear, unmindful of the terrors of the grim specter whose shadowy outline was drawing near, said to those around him: "Let my body be shrouded in the flag of the nation and my head be pillowed upon the Constitution of my country." What grander thought, what higher aspiration, could fill the mind of an American patriot and statesman in the hour of death!

No wonder, then, that those antagonisms growing out of party differences and bitter political strifes should have been softened or forever obliterated from the minds of his most relentless enemies, and that all over the civilized world men should feel that a great spirit had fallen when the lightning's flash, flying over valleys, along mountains, and under the billows of the ocean, brought the silent message, "ANDREW JOHNSON is dead!"

The aphorism that "republics are ungrateful" can no longer hold a place in truthful history. What king or potentate ever received higher honors from slaves and courtiers than the American people have conferred upon this untitled republican leader, making him the chief ruler of their nation while living, and now that he is dead the representatives of fifty millions of freemen pause in the business of legislation to do honor to his memory?

Every people, since the day the Romans planted their great empire upon the banks of the Tiber and the Greeks spread their civilization along the shores of the Mediterranean, have done honor to the fame and achievements of the great and illustrious of their countrymen after they were dead, whatever judgment they awarded them when living, and they have filled their galleries with paintings and studded their cities thick with monuments in commemoration of their deeds and in honor of their memory.

Nor have we been less generous to our illustrious dead than other and older nations of the world. The canvas upon which their features have been portrayed hangs from the pillars and decorates the walls of the Capitol, while their forms, cast in bronze or sculptured in marble, stand in the alcoves of the Rotunda like silent sentinels guarding the citadel of free institutions and American liberty. And though the glowing canvas may fade, the brass corrode, and the beautiful marble crumble into dust, yet their memory will live in story and song as long as tradition shall dwell in the human mind and until the stream of human history shall be lost in the waveless sea of oblivion. Death has of a verity been hurling its shafts at shining marks and taking its victims from the circle of the nation's great men.

Massachusetts has just buried HENRY WILSON, her own great commoner, who, like his distinguished compeer, rose from the humblest origin to the highest stations and most distinguished honors, and the emblems of mourning that festoon this Hall and droop with the half-mast flag of our country attest the nation's sympathy with the ancient Commonwealth of the East.

In the performance of these ceremonies, it would be well if we would forever forget the differences, growing as well out of the providence of God as the folly of men, which have so long and so unhappily divided those whom the interest of civilization and the destiny of their race require to be brothers not only in political relations but in social feeling.

It were better if we could consecrate this hour to the service of the living as well as to the honor of the dead by burying in the graves of ANDREW JOHNSON and HENRY WILSON the bitterness and hatreds which have so long burned in the hearts of our people. Let Massachusetts and Tennessee join hands over the tombs of their great statesmen and renew that broken bond of political union and fraternal affection which once bound them so nearly together.

Though they have entered the valley of the shadow of death, let us emerge from the shadow of our past misfortunes into the full brightness of that day the coming dawn of which already begins to gild with golden azure the heavy clouds which have so long hung upon our political horizon.

Now, in the opening of the centennial year of our national life, before the coming spring shall spread its vernal robe over the graves of our illustrious dead, let the yawning chasm rent by the throes of a horrid civil war be forever closed and the blessings of prosperity, good government, and perpetual peace be vouchsafed to a people who have made themselves worthy to receive them.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Mr. Speaker, being a native of Tennessee and having had official relations with Mr. JOHNSON, I feel it to be a melancholy duty to join in seconding the resolutions now being considered. In doing so I desire to say Mr. JOHNSON by what he was, and by what he did, by his qualities, his fortunes and his work, is entitled to prominent mention among the great leaders of his age and his country.

He is notably a representative of the common people of the land; of that class to whom the Republic must look for defense against foreign foes, upon whose broad shoulders the great industrial enterprises that minister so essentially to the necessities, comforts, and civilization of the nation rest; and who furnish the common sense from which the overruling sober second thought, so necessary to the preservation of our political equipoise, comes, and the sterling integrity that prompts all sacrifices and impels all great endeavors for patriotic purposes against either domestic or foreign foes. Without the advantages of wealth, social or influential aids; embarrassed by abject poverty; with the burdens of a dependent family, this child of the people, by sturdy toil, won his honorable success. He achieved competency, acquired knowledge, gained public notice and confidence; and from the humblest beginning arose step by step to the highest and most influential positions attainable by the most gifted and favored of the Republic, illustrating most fully in his career the beneficent and elevating effects of our free and liberal institutions. His success in life is not more noteworthy in the magnitude of difficulties surmounted and the honorable ends it compassed than by the simple and ordinary method by which it was accomplished. No magician preceded or accompanied him, by wand or lamp, to destroy his foes, build his palaces, or win his castles; but, living under institutions that furnished equal facilties for all and gave equal motives to well-doing for each, under the movings of a great nature he recognized the dignity of labor and contemplated the victory as much and as certainly as the resultant thereof as does the farmer regard the harvest as the result of his toil. Not by trick, nor by fortune, nor by favor, nor by fortuitous circumstances, but by painstaking labor, he conquered competency, knowledge, public confidence, influence, position, and all the distinguishing qualities and successes that make up the record of his remarkable career; and he leaves as a legacy, not the least valuable of those bequeathed to his country in his example, that not only may the humblest citizen aspire to a career as honorable as that of ANDREW JOHNSON, but that none are so poor as not to possess the same homely appliances of success, the diligent use of which rendered him so distinguished.

He is a remarkable instance of that type of our great men who have been distinguished for the persistency with which they have adhered to their political convictions. Born in the native State of Jackson, and resident in Tennessee where the hero of New Orleans lived, and coming into public life when this great leader was prominent in the councils that governed the nation, his political views belonged to the school of that great man rather than to either those of Calhoun or Clay, antagonizing in some sort the extremes of each on the question then vexing the public mind relative to the supremacy of the State or national authority. He believed in the sanctity of the local governments, because guaranteed in their functions by the Constitution of the sisterhood of States; yet as to the political relations of the States to each other he recognized the Federal authority as supreme. When in 1861 his section embraced the Calhoun theory rather than the Jacksonian view, he remained steadfast to his convictions, notwithstanding the violent and overwhelming opposition of his section. When his party, while he was President, went to the other extreme, and so far pressed the national idea into legislation as to substantially destroy the constitutional rights and authority of the local governments, he refused to follow their leadership, and stood by his early convictions.

Again, he recognized in his early public life the supremacy of the civil authority over the military, as guaranteed by the Constitution. In later life, amid the distempers and passions bred by civil war, no partisan considerations, no persuasion of political friends, no provocation of political foes, could induce him to ignore or violate this cardinal principle of our institutions. Still another belief of his youth and of his mature years, was one taught him when he was poor and friendless, and which he did not forget when he attained prosperity and distinction, that the people are not only the original depositaries of all power, under our form of government, but that they, in the exercise of the ballot and formation and influence of an intelligent and wholesome public opinion, are the conservators of free institutions. He was a man emphatically of the people, feeling that his personal citizenship exceeded in dignity any official position that he might hold; and he retained through life a profound confidence in the popular integrity and judgment. And when any great exigency was upon the country he looked not to cliques, nor to caucuses, nor to political conventions for relief or a wise solution of pending problems, but he always felt that with free speech and a free press the popular reference was the wisest, and always awaited the settlement by the people of the gravest questions with perfect confidence. He believed that not only the patriotism but the common sense of the people would be equal to any demand the country might make upon them, his consistency appearing not in uniform affiliation with any of the great parties, but in his persistent adherence to his convictions, despite party changes and party considerations.

Finally, ANDREW JOHNSON deserved well of the whole country, and especially so of the South: not only because a citizen and an efficient representative of the interests of that section in the highest councils of the nation, but particularly because of the policy pursued by him pending the existence of the trying ordeal to which that section was subjected in the process of political rehabilitation.

When the country, by the very crash of the conflict through which its unity and integrity were preserved, seemed to have been bewildered and cut loose from its moorings, and constitutional methods of restoration were deemed inadequate and were abandoned as insufficient, and peace and restoration were sought by proscription, he stood firm amid the general strife and wild confusion, imbued with the generous spirit, and proposing to carry out the catholic and brave measures of his great and lamented predecessor. He, by counsel and message, by act and deed, while appreciating the fact that we were brethren separated from each other because of radically varying conceptions of the Constitution, honestly entertained, and not that either party was essentially vicious, or recreant to the traditions of the country or the memory of the fathers, perceived that political restoration brought privileges as broad as the duties that it imposed, and that no re-adjustment could be real that did not proceed on the basis of mutual respect, and did not conclude and culminate in mutual good-will; and that these great ends could only be attained and secured by constitutional methods. He abated nothing in his demand for obedience to law, yielded nothing of his love of country, but made, or endeavored to make, reconstruction as little humiliating to the defeated people of my section, and as little onerous, as the facts and necessities of the great occasion would permit.

A man of strong will, sometimes he seemed arbitrary; of positive convictions, he seemed dogmatic; of comprehensive views, looking not only at the beginning but to the end, he seemed impracticable; of profound convictions, and not swayed by considerations of expediency, he seemed unreasonable. With life's victory won by a struggle so sternly earnest that the nature developed by the very discipline that made it large and imposing became somewhat indurated, yet in simple manliness, sturdy integrity, and a personal fidelity to friend and country that never wavered his was a grand character; and, take him all in all—his beginning, his work, and the end—he has not left his peer, and we shall scarcely in this generation look upon his like again.

His messages to Congress, in my judgment, rank among the ablest of American state papers, and will be regarded in the future as among the strongest vindications of the rights of the citizen and the States that have been produced by the statesmanship of our country.

When that auspicious day shall come, as I trust it will at no distant period, that the passions and prejudices engendered by the late sectional strife have been banished from the hearts of our people forever; when the American mind, North and South, East and West, can regard the prowess of the soldiery of both sections and the grand achievements of the military leaders on both sides and do justice alike to all, regardless of the cause or section represented, as representative types of American character and American greatness; when that time comes, and the popular heart is moved but by one impulse of devotion to the Union and the Constitution, then will the memory of Mr. JOHNSON live in the hearts of the masses of our countrymen, and then his faults, from which none are exempt, shall cease to be remembered.

The question being taken on the resolutions offered by Mr. MCFARLAND, they were agreed to unanimously.

And accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin: The petition of W. P. Stow, for relief, to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan: The petition of Henry A. Sangar, for relief, to the same committee.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 12, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WINDOM presented the petition of J. A. Wilcox and 164 other citizens of Green Lake County, Wisconsin, praying for the speedy completion of the Fox River improvement and the construction of an ample canal along the banks of the Wisconsin River from Portage City, Wisconsin, to the Mississippi River, in accordance with the third plan recommended to the Government by Major-General Warren, of the United States Engineer Corps; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY presented the petition of Frank J. Darling and 33 others, citizens of Michigan, praying that the name of John S. Clay may be placed upon the pension-roll; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of John S. Clay, of Shiawassee County, Michigan, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. KERNAN presented the petition of Henry Cunningham, praying the enactment of a special law granting him a pension on account of the loss of his son, James Cunningham, late a private in Company B, First United States Cavalry; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented fourteen petitions of citizens of New York, soldiers in the late war, praying for an amendment to the act of March 3, 1875, as to pensions, extending the time of limitation for obtaining arrears until July 4, 1876; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DORSEY presented the petition of citizens of Fort Smith, Arkansas, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of the Arkansas River by removing the sand-bar opposite that city; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a letter and memorial of the mayor and common council of Fort Smith, praying an appropriation for the improvement of the Arkansas River by the removal of the sand-bar opposite that city; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial of the Legislature of Arkansas, in favor of the passage of an act refunding the cotton tax; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CONKLING presented thirteen petitions of citizens of New York, members of different regiments of New York troops in the late war, praying an amendment to the fifteenth section of the act to revise, consolidate, and amend the laws relating to pensions, approved March 3, 1873, to the end that they may receive pensions; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of citizens of the city of New York, praying the adoption of a resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting appropriations of money or property, directly or indirectly, to any religious body or sect; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WHYTE presented the petition of Julius S. Bohrer, late master, United States Navy, praying to be restored to his position in the Navy as master as of January, 1866; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of George R. Humphries, praying compensation for property seized by the United States during the late war of the rebellion, have had the same under consideration, and instructed me to report adversely thereon, and ask to be discharged from its further consideration.

I will state in this connection that I report back this case, as also the petition of Sylvanus Humphries praying compensation for like property, and also the petition of William J. Porter praying compensation, the petition of William Jackson, jr., praying compensation, the petition of John Tynes praying compensation, the petition of Atkinson W. Turner praying compensation, the petition of Meritt Alman praying compensation, the petition of Nancy Bowser praying compensation, the petition of Miles Holley, the petition of Sarah E. Wedelstedt, and the petition of George Holloway; and I wish to say with reference to all these claims that they seem to be of the same character, the petitions evidently drawn by the same person. In many instances they are signed by the petitioners with their mark. There is no testimony whatever in support of the petitions, and, the claims originating some ten years since, many, if not all, of them were cognizable by the southern claims commission. There is no reason shown why the petitioners did not apply before this to Congress, nor yet any reason why they did not go before the southern claims commissioners. Under these circumstances I ask that the report of the committee adverse to these claims be concurred in by the Senate by a vote that the report be adopted.

Mr. WITHERS. I could not hear the Senator over the way. What is the character of those claims exactly?

Mr. WRIGHT. The petitioners all ask compensation for property destroyed by the United States troops in 1862 and 1863. There is no evidence whatever in support of the petitions. Many, if not all, of them could have gone to the southern claims commission. There is no reason shown why they did not go there, nor is there any reason shown why they have not applied to Congress before this, the claims dating nearly fourteen years since.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the report that the prayer of these petitions be not granted.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Frances A. Robinson, administratrix of the estate of John M. Robinson, deceased, praying compensation for property taken possession of and used by United States troops at Independence, Missouri, during the late war, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 237) for the relief of Frances A. Robinson, administratrix of the estate of John M. Robinson, deceased.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of William F. Walsh, of New Orleans, Louisiana, praying to be paid a certain judgment of the United States provisional court of Louisiana out of the proceeds of sequestrated property of Trasimon Landry in the Treasury, have instructed me to report adversely. This case was reported adversely at the last session. No additional evidence is now offered to the committee, and the committee decline to review the conclusion reached by the committee of the last session, and they ask that the report be adopted.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Cyrus W. Threlkeld, a citizen of Kentucky, praying to have refunded to him out of the United States Treasury the sum of $609, being the proceeds of the sale of eighty-six acres of land situated in that State and confiscated and sold by the judgment and decree of the district court of the United States for the district of Kentucky, rendered on the 24th day of February, 1865, reported adversely thereon, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

CUSTOM-HOUSE LOT AT ROCKLAND.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, who were directed by resolution of the Senate of the 9th of December to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell a small piece of land from the custom-house lot in Rockland, Maine, reported a bill (S. No. 235) providing for the sale of part of the custom-house lot in Rockland, Maine; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think that the bill may as well be acted upon now, for there can be no objection to it.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 235) was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to sell and convey a strip of land from the easterly side of the custom-house lot in Rockland, Maine, being that part of the lot lying easterly of the proposed street running through the lot, being about 18.6 feet wide at the northerly end and running southerly 121.4 feet to a point, and containing about 1,122 square feet, at public auction or private sale; but the land is to be sold for not less than the original cost to the Government.

Mr. HAMLIN. This is a little strip of land that lies on the opposite side of the street from the custom-house and that is of no earthly value to the Government; but it can be sold under the limitation in the bill that it shall not be sold for less than it cost, or at public auction, as the Secretary shall see proper. I think it is a thing most eminently fit to be done.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Would it not be well to add a proviso that the power to sell shall terminate in two years?

Mr. HAMLIN. I have no objection to that, but I will say one year. I move to amend the bill by adding the following additional proviso:

Provided, That the sale of said land shall be made in one year from the approval of this act.

Mr. CLAYTON. Is there any reason why this property should not be sold by public auction alone? I see the bill requires it to be sold at public or private sale. I suggest to the Senator from Maine that he strike out the words "private sale" and let it be sold at public sale.

Mr. HAMLIN. The answer to that is that this is a little strip of land that lies on the opposite side of the street from the custom-house and in the rear of certain buildings on another street. It is worth nothing to anybody in the world except to the owners in front of it. Now, if you sell it at public auction there may be a combination and you may get nothing for it, whereas, if you sell it at private sale and limit the sale to what it cost the Government, those men who own the buildings in front will purchase the property at a fair value.

Mr. CLAYTON. Would it not be better to offer it first at public sale, and, if not sold in that way, then sell it at private sale?

Mr. HAMLIN. That is a matter for the regulation of the Department. It is left to the option of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. CLAYTON. I think it ought to be offered at public sale first, and I suggest an amendment to that effect.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I would say that this is a very small strip of land, a very acute triangle, only 18 feet 6 inches at one end, and running to a point at the other, and the whole amount of it is 1,122 feet, and not very valuable anyhow.

Mr. CLAYTON. Where is it located?

Mr. HAMLIN. In Rockland, Maine.

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not see any objection to offering it at public sale first. It certainly cannot interfere with the disposition of this property. If it be offered at public sale everybody has a right to bid, and if it does not bring what the Secretary thinks it should bring it can be withdrawn from public sale.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. We have a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury approving of the proposition to have it sold.

Mr. CLAYTON. Very well; I withdraw all objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; and the amendment was concurred in.

It was ordered that the bill be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

PAPER CONTRACTS FOR PRINTING.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report a bill (S. No. 236) to amend section 3367 of the Revised Statutes in relation to the purchase of paper for the public printing, which I would like to have passed this morning, as the intention of it is to save some money in some advertisements which are obliged to be put out immediately. It has met the unanimous approbation of the Committee on Printing of both Houses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be reported in full if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 3367 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended so that it will read:

"The Joint Committee on Public Printing shall fix upon standards of paper for the different descriptions of public printing, and the Congressional Printer shall under their direction advertise in two newspapers published in each of the cities of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, and Cincinnati, for sealed proposals to furnish the Government with paper as specified in the schedule to be furnished to applicants by the Congressional Printer, setting forth in detail the quality and quantities required for the public printing; and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed."

Mr. ANTHONY. This, Mr. President, enables the Congressional Printer to shorten an advertisement without any detriment to the public service or business, and that is the only object of it.

By unanimous consent the bill was read three times, and passed.

WITNESSES BEFORE MILITARY COURTS.

Mr. CRAGIN. I am directed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred Senate bill No. 202, to secure the attendance and payment of witnesses before military courts, to report it without amendment, and, as there are certain reasons for immediate action in this case, I ask that the bill may be considered at the present time if there be no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks the present consideration of the bill. It will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill; which grants to every judge-advocate of a military court in the Army or Navy power to issue the like process to compel witnesses to appear and testify before such court which courts of criminal jurisdiction within the State, Territory, or District where such court shall be ordered to sit may lawfully issue; and that civilian witnesses in such military or naval courts shall be allowed the same fees as are allowed for travel and attendance in the civil courts of such State, Territory, or District; which fees shall be paid by any paymaster of the Army or Navy respectively, upon the certificate of the president and the judge-advocate of such court.

Mr. CRAGIN. This bill is precisely word for word like the present law, to be found on page 213 of the Revised Statutes under the chapter "Army," with the mere addition in the first clause of the words "or Navy." The last clause of the bill provides for the payment of civilian witnesses the same fees that are allowed them by the States or Territories wherever courts-martial may be held, and authorizing the paymaster of the Army and Navy to pay these civilian witnesses. There is a particular case now pending where it is doubtful whether a judge-advocate in the Navy has authority to subpœna witnesses, especially civilian witnesses, outside of the officers of the Navy. It is desirable that that question should be settled, and as this bill only adds the words "or Navy" to the present law and provides for the payment of the witnesses, I apprehend there will be no objection to it. If there is, let the bill go upon the Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I would like to ask the Senator, reserving the right to object, what he understands this bill will mean if it be enacted into a law? It says—

That every judge-advocate of a military court in the Army or Navy shall have power to issue the like process to compel witnesses to appear and testify, &c.

Now, does the Senator mean by that that a judge-advocate is to bring a witness up for contempt on his own order, if he does not appear to testify, and punish him for contempt of his authority?

Mr. CRAGIN. I suppose, if this bill is enacted into a law, it will have the same effect, so far as compelling the attendance of witnesses before naval courts, that now exists in regard to military courts. The Senator from Vermont is a good lawyer, and knows what the present statute is, and this is simply, word for word, the present statute with the addition of the words "or Navy."

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend from New Hampshire is mistaken in two things. In the first place, I am not a good lawyer; and, in the second place, I do not know what the statute means. The statute as it now exists is very ambiguous indeed, and my suggestion is that we ought not to pass another just like it without putting it in language so clear that there will not be any misapprehension. It is true the present law says that a judge-advocate of the Army in any court-martial shall have power to issue process to compel the attendance of witnesses; but what is the true construction of the present statute which applies to the Army is to my mind a question of a great deal of doubt. I should be indisposed, for one, to repose in any one single officer, the prosecuting officer before a military court, the power to issue process to compel witnesses to attend, and to punish them because he thought they were in contempt of his authority; in other words, to direct his orderly, or whatever the military officer may be, to go and arrest a citizen and bring him by force before him. There is no clause in the statute that I know of which gives military courts power to punish contempt committed by civilians; but this is an authority in the Revised Statutes as it stands now, not to the court-martial, which I could readily understand—and that is the way it ought to be—not an authority to the court-martial through its judge-advocate to issue process to compel the attendance of witnesses before it by bringing them up bodily if they do not choose to come on an ordinary subpœna, but it confers power alone upon the judge-advocate, a particular officer. If the witness does not obey his summons has he authority to issue another mandate to bring up the witness and punish him himself by a fine or imprisonment for contempt? If he has that authority, in my opinion he ought not to have it. If he has not that authority, where do we raise the presumption that a court-martial has any such authority? This section of the Revised Statutes does not confer it; it is not conferred in fact upon a court-martial at all; and therefore, this present statute being in so much doubt as to its proper construction, as it does use the terms "compel the attendance of a witness," not merely to issue a subpœna, it appeared to me that we ought to put this fresh statute, which covers all the ground of the present one and of the Navy as well, into plain words that would either confer upon a court-martial the power to punish witnesses for contempt if not appearing, or else put it so clearly that neither the court nor the judge-advocate should have the power.

It is plain to my mind, and I think every Senator will agree with me, that we ought not to confer any such power upon a single judge-advocate of anybody's court any more than we would upon the district attorney in any of our civil proceedings. That is what has led me to make these inquiries. It does not appear to me that we ought to pass a statute which is so open to doubt and misconstruction. We ought to make it plain one way or the other; and so I think the bill had perhaps better go over for consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. WHYTE. I desire merely to state, for the information of the Senator from Vermont, that naval courts-martial have power now by the Revised Statutes to punish witnesses for contempt in refusing to testify. I rather think that this bill contemplates the payment of witnesses rather than anything else. The power is lodged now with naval courts-martial to punish witnesses who refuse to testify before them.

Mr. LOGAN. Witnesses who belong to the Navy, not civilians.

Mr. WHYTE. It does not limit it.

Mr. THURMAN. What is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CRAGIN] asked for the consideration of a bill reported by him from the committee of which he is chairman, and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] having objected to its present consideration, it goes on the Calendar according to the rules.

Mr. CRAGIN. On reflection I move that this bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary on account of the importance of the subject. I suggested that course to the Senator from Vermont at the time I introduced the bill; but he, evidently wishing to be modest, suggested that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. The bill, as I said before, is designed especially for a particular case, and an important case, where it is necessary that civilian witnesses should be summoned to testify before a court-martial, and some of them have already raised the question that there is no authority on the part of the judge-advocate to summon them. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and I hope they will very speedily consider the subject and report the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think it is necessary to refer the bill. It is a simple point, and an amendment can be prepared without the formality of a reference. I do not believe it is worth while to do that. Let it stay on the table.

Mr. CRAGIN. Then I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WHYTE (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 238) to restore Julius S. Bohrer to the Navy of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAYTON (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 239) authorizing the Secretary of War to correct an Army officer's record; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONKLING asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 240) relating to the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HARVEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduced a bill (S. No. 241) to equalize the bounties of soldiers who served in the late war for the Union; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduced a bill (S. No. 242) to abolish capital punishment; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT. I introduce the bill without committing myself to its provisions. I move its reference to the Committeee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DORSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 243) to place all colored troops who enlisted in the Army on an equality with other soldiers as to bounty and pensions; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 244) to establish the collection district of Arkansas; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. CONKLING, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Annie E. Paige be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. OGLESBY. I ask the adoption of the following order:

Ordered, That the petition and papers of Joseph Robbins, of Quincy, Illinois, praying additional compensation for services rendered the United States as examining surgeon of applicants for invalid pensions, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Illinois and also of the Senator from New York, who ask for the withdrawal of papers, whether there have been adverse reports in either of these cases?

Mr. OGLESBY. I will state to the Senator from Iowa that there has been no adverse report in this case, because the Committee on Claims, in reply to my urgent solicitation, said they could not find time to act upon it at all at the last session, and they thought it better to let it go over to this session and start afresh with a new Congress. I have taken their suggestion.

Mr. WRIGHT. There has been an adverse report in the case?

Mr. OGLESBY. None at all.

Mr. WRIGHT. I should like to inquire about the other case, whether there was an adverse report.

Mr. CONKLING. Without knowing personally, my information is that there was not.

The order was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. COOPER, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of B. & D. W. Fenton be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. CLAYTON, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of William G. Ford be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

TREASURY ACCOUNTS.

Mr. DAVIS. A few days ago I gave notice that on to-day I should ask the Senate to permit me to make some remarks on the public expenditures, the revenue, and the public debt of the Government. I now offer a resolution, which I wish to have read for information, and printed, and laid on the table until to-morrow morning; when I will ask the Senate to take it up, and to allow me to submit some remarks upon it.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas there appear to be material alterations and discrepancies in the official finance reports of the Treasury Department as to the annual expenditures, receipts of the Government, and public debt, and particularly in the reports of 1869 to 1872, inclusive, which discrepancies and changes and alterations involve large amounts, and no satisfactory explanation appears on the face for the same: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That a committee of five be appointed to investigate the books and accounts of the Treasury Department, particularly with reference to discrepancies and alterations in amounts and figures that have been made in them, especially in the annual statements of the expenditures of the Government, revenue collected, and the public debt, contained in said reports, and if any such discrepancies and alterations be found to exist, to report the same and the extent and nature thereof, the years wherein they occur, by what authority made, if any, the reasons that induced them, and to report generally such other and further information bearing upon the subject as to them may seem best, and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

The resolution was ordered to be printed and lie on the table.

OFFICE OF PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further resolutions the morning hour has expired, and the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business, being the resolutions of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] in regard to the tenure of office of the President pro tempore of the Senate. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] to postpone indefinitely the third resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

3. Resolved, That the office of President pro tempore of the Senate is held at the pleasure of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I am so much surprised at the doubt my friend from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] expressed about this thing that I think it necessary for me to say a few words upon the subject for my own satisfaction, if not for that of anybody else.

The power of the Senate to elect a President pro tempore is one which is named in the Constitution. It is there provided—

The Vice-President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no vote, unless they be equally divided.

The Senate shall choose their other officers, and also a President pro tempore, in the absence of the Vice-President, or when he shall exercise the office of President of the United States.

I think it obvious, from the well-known course of law existing at the time the Constitution was formed, that this clause empowering the Senate to choose a President pro tempore was inserted merely to rebut an implication that would arise from the statement that the Vice-President shall be President of the Senate. If that clause had not been put into the Constitution there would have been no need to insert the other, that the Senate should have power to choose a President pro tempore, any more than there would have been to insert in the powers of the House of Representatives a power on the part of that body to choose a Speaker pro tempore; and no such clause is introduced into it because, as I say, it was well known, from the constitution of all parliamentary or other deliberative bodies, that it is one of their inherent powers, in order that they may act at all, in order that they may exist in any active sense, that they shall select some person to preside over their deliberations.

Therefore it appears to me plain, in the first place, that this clause touching the power of the Senate to elect a President pro tempore was merely put in to exclude the presumption which might otherwise have arisen from the preceding clause which states that the Vice-President of the United States shall be the President of the Senate—to exclude the presumption that that was an exclusion of the power of the Senate to have a President pro tempore in his absence, and the Senate in that case, of course, would be obliged to wait until he should come, just as for a long time in England the House of Commons were totally unable to do any business at all, according to their precedents and usages, when the speaker was absent or sick or unable to take the chair; for they had no power, as they then understood, growing up as they did, to select anybody to act as speaker pro tempore. They got over that delusion, however, I will add, a good while ago; but that used to be the first impression.

Inasmuch as this first clause would be a direct declaration that the Vice-President of the United States, and he alone in a legal sense, should be the President of the Senate, in order to guard against any question that might arise as to the ordinary power of the Senate to exercise what would otherwise be one of its inherent functions, this additional clause was inserted, that in the absence of the Vice-President, or while he exercised the duties of President of the United States, the Senate should choose a President pro tempore.

Then the question is what is a President pro tempore? The Constitution does not say "they shall choose a President to fill the vacancy caused in the presidency of the Senate when the Vice-President exercises the office of President of the United States," which is for a fixed period, when the President dies, during the whole period of his unexpired term. So I conclude that if the Constitution-makers had intended that the President pro tempore of the Senate, in spite of the very meaning of those words, should be an officer who had a title to an office which was continuous, determined either by the efflux of time or by some external contingency, they would have said so and would have declared, when they were regulating the office of the President pro tempore of the Senate, that this officer should hold his office until the Vice-President should again take the chair or until the expiration of the term of the Vice-President who had been transferred to the performance of the duties of President of the United States. That would have most naturally occurred to everybody who had intended that the Presiding Officer of the Senate should be an officer irremovable at the pleasure of the Senate, as upon all principles it is agreed that but for this clause he would have been. I think that was admitted in the debates by gentlemen on the other side. It would have been easy for them to have said so; and had it been in their minds there can be but very little question that they would have said so, as it appears to me.

But what does "President pro tempore" mean? It has never been held, that I know of, until this discussion, that "pro tempore" means during the period of the absence of the Vice-President or during the period that he is exercising the functions of President of the United States; "pro tempore" does not mean that, or it never did until now. It has always been understood to mean—and I believe there is as little question about its uniformity of construction as of any words that ever appear in proceedings—"for the time being;" that is, the instant, the present time, and not for any future time, either to-morrow or next day. A president or an officer, anything "for the time being" is for the present time, and to-morrow would be another time; and, but for the construction that we have put upon this clause of the Constitution, and which we have affirmed by the resolutions we have already adopted, I should have had no doubt that it would have been the duty of the Senate every morning during the absence of the Vice-President to elect a President pro tempore for that day. I should have had no doubt about it at all; but we have construed by a long course of usage the duration of the office of our President pro tempore not to terminate with the particular day of our session upon which he is called to the chair; and so we have affirmed it now to be our law, and I believe it to be.

I am fortified in this opinion completely by the state of the English law upon the subject at the time the Constitution was made, and, indeed, ever since, until quite recently. Of course everybody knows that the Senate was constituted upon the model of the House of Lords. Senators do not hold their offices for life, as the Lords do, but they hold them independent of direct elections by the people. They are selected by other bodies than the people—by the Legislatures of the States—and they have a limited term. Like the Lords, they have regularly a Presiding Officer who is not one of their body, but who is an independent and external officer, if I may use that phrase. The Lord Chancellor in England, or, if he be dead, the Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, is the regular presiding officer of the House of Lords, not a member of the body, having no vote. In the practice of the House of Lords and under its immemorial proceedings, when the Lord Chancellor was absent, just as we say "when the Vice-President is absent," the Lords chose a speaker of the Lords pro tempore, the very phrase being used in all the journals and proceedings, as well known a parliamentary common law in England as any other law that existed in England at the time our Constitution was made. But you will find, when you look at the journals of the Lords, that although their standing order reads, as it appears in May's book on parliamentary law—I cannot find the original order—that they are to choose a speaker pro tempore "during the vacancy," which is a much stronger term than simply "pro tempore;" yet every morning they choose a fresh speaker pro tempore, usually the same gentleman, of course; but I am speaking of the officer. He only holds by virtue of the standing orders of the Lords from day to day, and the first thing after prayers are said and the house is counted, in the absence of the Lord Chancellor, is to elect a speaker pro tempore, and he holds through that day. The next day, the Chancellor not appearing, the same ceremony is gone through with, until the Lord Chancellor appears.

I say that the wise men who framed the Constitution and who were modeling it in this respect somewhat upon the methods and proceedings and characteristics of the government with which they were most familiar, in providing for this President pro tempore of the Senate in the absence of the Vice-President, must have expected that those words would have the same construction that they were known to have by the immemorial practice and common law of the House of Lords in Great Britain. So then our historic knowledge, as well as the words of the Constitution, clearly proves to my mind that the President pro tempore holds his office at the pleasure of this body, and that every day, if we like, we may select another officer, and but for our long practice—a very convenient one, too, indeed—I should have said, if the question were a new one, that he would only hold his office from day to day, without an order of the Senate, which it would be perfectly competent to make, of course, that he should hold for any definite length of time or until the re-appearance of the regular presiding officer.

But certainly, Mr. President, whatever may be said upon this topic, the Constitution does not fix the term of the President pro tempore. The most that can be said is that it leaves it open to doubt and dispute. It does not define how long he shall exercise the powers of that office. Now, then, the law in this country is perfectly well settled, (and every lawyer I suppose is familiar with it,) decided by the Supreme Court of the United States more than once, that where the Constitution does not fix—that is the language of the Court—the term of an officer appointed under the Constitution, he is removable at any time at the pleasure of the appointing power. I am not now discussing the question of removals by the President, whether with or without the consent of the Senate. That is open to dispute, as we all understand. But as the Supreme Court say, in the case of Hennen in 13 Peters's Reports, (which I have brought in for any gentleman to read if he likes,) whether the assent of the Senate be necessary to a removal by the President of an officer appointed under the Constitution, all parties agree, and it is clear law, that the appointing power, the whole body of the appointing power, has the clear right to remove at its pleasure any officer appointed under the Constitution whose term of office is not fixed by it. The Constitution confessedly does not fix the term, by any definite language of any sort, during which this officer shall exercise his functions. It does not say that he shall hold until the end of the term of the Vice-President who is exercising the office of President of the United States or that he shall hold until the Vice-President returns. It says he shall hold "pro tempore." Now it is said to be open to doubt whether "pro tempore" means for the time being or for some future time to be determined by some subsequent event; but in any case, as the Constitution has not defined how long this officer shall hold, the law is clear, as with every other officer of the United States whose term is not fixed, that the power of appointment includes the power of removal and change. When, therefore, the Senate of the United States has power to appoint a President pro tempore and other officers, as the committee so well state in their report, there is carried in that grant of power also the right to change those officers at pleasure. So it appears clear to me that this third resolution declares a plain principle of law, which is binding upon us, and which it is our duty for the benefit of the future to declare.

Then, sir, when we look at the serious inconveniences that would arise if you were to take the other construction, I am sure, if we had any doubt upon the language of the Constitution and the history of the subject and the decisions of the Supreme Court, we should solve that doubt in favor of the constant power of the Senate to choose its presiding officer pro tempore at any time it pleases. Where should we find ourselves if the construction is correct that the power of the Senate once exercised is exhausted, and cannot be again exercised until there is a new absence of the Vice-President? Then, if the President pro tempore were to be sick or to die, where would be our power? The Constitution, under the peculiar circumstances that it was made, gives us an express power to do a particular thing, and that is to elect a President pro tempore in the absence of the Vice-President. It does not give us power to elect a President pro tempore in the absence of the preceding President pro tempore. It is only "in the absence of the Vice-President" by name. Now, if this power is to be exercised only once, then, when the Vice-President is absent and the President pro tempore already elected is absent, we must be adjourned from day to day by the Secretary until we can find one or the other of these gentlemen. That would never do. If you hold, on the other hand, that the power is not exhausted, and that you may exercise it in the absence of the President pro tempore, you exercise it in his absence not by the force of the Constitution which says you may do it then, but you exercise it by force of the Constitution which says that in the absence of the Vice-President you may elect a President pro tempore. The Vice-President being absent, although you have one President pro tempore, he is gone, and then you have another. So that it is either the whole thing or nothing, as it appears to me. If the power is exhausted when once exercised, there is no power to supply a vacancy existing in the office of President pro tempore by the Constitution which we are now speaking of. If the power is not exhausted by its exercise in one case, it is a constant power, which the Senate may exercise on any occasion that it deems fit. One fit occasion would be the absence of the President pro tempore. Another fit occasion might be his becoming unfit to discharge the duties of his office. Another fit occasion might be as I should say instead of being contrary to propriety, in all propriety the case that was mentioned the day before yesterday, when the parties of this body being responsible for the exercise of governmental powers and for the course of legislation should change; and when parties should change and one party should find itself brought into power with a President pro tempore of the other party in the chair, exercising the great powers that the President of the Senate does exercise, I should say it would be the duty of that party, instead of a wrong, to change the President pro tempore, because he is the organ of the responsible body, and without his being in harmony with the political views of the gentlemen in the majority their will might often be frustrated. He appoints special committees; he does a thousand things which are of the greatest importance to the political interests of the country; and to say that one party may saddle another for the time being with a President pro tempore, and that that other party, when the times shall change, and they become responsible for the administration of affairs, cannot oust him and have a presiding officer of their own, would, in my opinion, be contrary to the principles of republican government. A party cannot get on that way, and it ought not to get on that way.

So I say, Mr. President, that not only the Constitution itself as it reads, the history to which I have referred and which is indisputable, and what is known to be the regular course of practice and the settled law in England when the Constitution was made, but the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States upon the general subject of removals from office, and the extreme inconvenience of any other construction of the Constitution, make it plain, as it appears to me, that we ought to adopt this resolution.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the Senator from Vermont permit me to ask him whether this resolution would cover the case of the devolving of the Presidency of the United States on the incumbent of the chair, the President of the Senate pro tempore? In other words, does he hold that the Senate would have the power to change the President pro tempore of the Senate after the Presidency of the United States had been cast upon him by the operation of the act of 1792?

Mr. EDMUNDS. This resolution does not refer to that question at all. We are merely asserting the general power of the Senate. Whether the Senate would have power to change its President pro tempore after he by law should be required to perform the duties of President of the United States is of course entirely another question. If it is of any advantage to my friend from Pennsylvania to know my opinion, although it is entirely outside of this debate, I will state it frankly. I think the power of the Senate over its President pro tempore, which exists in the nature of its own body and under the Constitution, cannot be cut short by any act of Congress whatever.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, I have given this question a very cursory examination, and I regret to say that from that examination I am compelled to differ with the opinion of the majority of the committee. I shall briefly give my views to the Senate, if they will hear me.

The tenure of the office of President pro tempore of the Senate is not, I think, as the committee say it is, like that of the Secretary or the Sergeant-at-Arms or the Chief Clerk of the Senate. He is, in my view, an officer of the United States as well as of the Senate. The fifth clause of section 1 of article 2 of the Constitution provides as follows:

> In case of the removal of the President from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the Vice-President, and the Congress may by law provide for the case of removal, death, resignation, or inability, both of the President and Vice-President, declaring what officer shall then act as President, and such officer shall act accordingly, until the disability be removed, or a President shall be elected.

The obvious meaning of the word "officer" here is an officer of the United States, and I assume that neither the Senator from Vermont nor any other lawyer will dispute that the meaning of the word "officer," as used in this clause of the Constitution, is not an officer of the Senate, but an officer of the United States. This obvious meaning of the word "officer" is confirmed when we refer to the proceedings of the convention that framed the Constitution. The latter part of this clause first appears in a motion made September 7, 1787, to insert these words:

> The legislature may declare by law what officer of the United States shall act as President in case of the death, resignation, or disability of the President and Vice-President; and such officer shall act accordingly, &c.

This motion was adopted by a vote of States, and this and the other provisions adopted were on the 8th referred to a committee to revise the style, who were to arrange the articles agreed on. Of this committee Messrs. Hamilton and Madison were two. A report came in on the 12th, and the words now in the Constitution are found therein.

It is thus seen that the intention of the framers of the Constitution to place the possible succession to the presidency only upon an officer of the United States is plain and manifest.

We next find that the contemporaneous interpretation of this clause of the Constitution is in accord with the position I assert. The act of March 1, 1792, which was framed by many of those who were in the federal convention, points out the President pro tempore of the Senate as an officer of the United States upon whom the succession may fall. Is it reasonable to suppose that Madison and Sherman and Gerry would have clothed with such grave possibilities an official whose tenure and dignity were no greater than those of a Sergeant-at-Arms.

But we are not left to conjecture on this subject, for in the debates during the passage of the act of 1792 this very question was mooted. Pending the debate upon the bill it was both asserted and denied that the President pro tempore was an officer of the United States within the meaning of clause 5 of section 1 of article 2, but after a prolonged struggle the question was settled affirmatively, and the bill became a law. Both Roger Sherman and Elbridge Gerry asserted the position that the President pro tempore was an officer of the United States, and the latter declared that the Speaker of the House had equal dignity. Madison objected to the selection of the President pro tempore or Speaker for the succession, not because he was not an officer, but because if he became President he would be both Senator and President, and might be instructed by his State.

The express words in the text, the intention of the framers of the Constitution as shown by the adoption of the clause referred to the committee on revision of style, contemporaneous legal interpretation—the words of the men who framed the Constitution themselves—unite in affirming the position that the President pro tempore of the Senate is an officer of the United States; and, unless we utterly and completely nullify and ignore the term "officer" in the clause that I have read from the Constitution, no other conclusion is possible. It is as plain as that two and two make four. If the legislation of 1792 be worth anything at all, it interprets the provision of the Constitution to which I have referred, and the adoption by that act of 1792 of the President pro tempore of the Senate, and confirms the position I have taken.

That he was in those days regarded as more than a mere official of the Senate is shown by the practice then originated at his election to officially inform both the President and the House of Representatives thereof. This occurred in April, 1792, in March, 1793, and has been continued since. If he be a mere officer of the Senate, why should we dignify him by sending information of his election to the House of Representatives and to the President? That these views have had support in the past is found from what Mr. Seward said in the Senate in December, 1854, and I will read what he said. Pending a motion to proceed to the election of a President pro tempore, he said:

> Mr. SEWARD. Before we proceed with this election, I should like to have the views of Senators in regard to the effect of the appointment—whether it is to be an absolute appointment of a President pro tempore, and what the tenure of his office is to be. I will state very freely my own opinion in going into this election, and it is this: that there can be but one person at the same time holding the office of President pro tempore of the Senate of the United States, and that that person will hold his office until it shall again constitutionally become vacant; so that in the case of a vacancy occurring in the office of the President of the United States the person now to be chosen to fill the office of President pro tempore of the Senate would succeed to that high trust, and become the Chief Executive Magistrate of the United States.—Congressional Globe, Thirty-third Congress, second session, page 4.

Thus affirming a constitutional tenure on the part of the President pro tempore of the Senate. Now, if he be an officer of the United States holding this place, it remains to discover the tenure by which this officer of the United States holds his place. This can only be reached by learning the true meaning of clause 5, of section 3, of article 1, of the Constitution. It is in these words:

> The Senate shall choose their other officers, and also a President pro tempore, in the absence of the Vice-President, or when he shall exercise the office of President of the United States.

The Senate is a perpetual and is intended to be a conservative body, and that construction which will produce stability and permanence in its organization, and exclude uncertainty, passion, or party prejudice, is to be preferred. While I concede that the subject is not free from doubt, yet, in considering the purpose to be attained, the evils to be avoided, the ordinary meaning of the words used, and the rights and privileges of the incumbent under the act of 1792, and as an officer of the Government, my mind reaches the conclusion that the words pro tempore ought not to be construed so narrowly as to reduce the tenure of the official from a term held until the Vice-President shall return, or the term of office of the incumbent shall expire, to a term held at the mere will of the majority of this body. The words "pro tempore" are a designation of the official in my view, and do not measure his official term. Or, if they are to be used for that purpose, then they relate to and are synonymous with the words which follow, a President pro tempore, or for the time being; that is to say, for the time during which the Vice-President is absent, or while he exercises the office of President.

This seems plainly apparent from the action had in the Federal convention. The report of the committee of eleven contained the clause in these words:

> The Vice-President shall be, ex officio, President of the Senate, except when they sit to try the impeachment of the President, in which case the Chief Justice shall preside, and excepting, also, when he shall exercise the powers and duties of President, in which case, and in case of his absence, the Senate shall choose a President pro tempore.

This was adopted by the convention, and referred to the committee of revision and style. It came back substantially in the form in which it is now in the Constitution, and was adopted with the single exception that the words "ex officio" were stricken out. In the original clause the words "pro tempore" can only relate to one of the two cases named, and cannot be used to measure his tenure of official place.

> And excepting, also, when he shall exercise the powers and duties of President, in which case, and in case of his absence, the Senate shall choose a President pro tempore.

Here is a plain designation of the official by the term "pro tempore;" here is plain reference to the case of the absence of the Vice-President or his occupancy of the presidential chair.

The dignity of the place, as shown by the plain words of the fifth clause of section 1, of article 2, and by contemporaneous legal interpretation, the necessity for certainty in the official upon whom the succession may fall, the conservative character of the Senate, the plain intent of the framers of the Constitution, and the meaning of the words used constrain me to the conclusion that the office of President pro tempore of the Senate is an office as well of the United States as of the Senate, and that his official term is ended only by the expiration of his service as Senator, by the return of the Vice-President, by impeachment and conviction for offenses committed as President pro tempore, or by expulsion from the Senate.

It is asked whether we could appoint a second President pro tempore in the absence of the President pro tempore elected under the Constitution? The answer to that is found in the practice of the body. Richard Henry Lee was elected the first President pro tempore of the Senate. At the succeeding session of the Senate he did not return, or he resigned subsequently to the meeting of the Senate, and they then elected as President pro tempore for the occasion John Langdon, who sat in his place until the expiration of the succeeding session. So there is no difficulty in that question.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that the whole question resolves itself, not upon parliamentary law, but upon the plain interpretation and meaning of our own Constitution. It is found here. The constitution of this body, as well as the Constitution of the United States, seems to me to clothe this officer with dignity and with power, and that he ought not to be limited.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, until this question was brought before the committee I had never heard a suggestion from any source that the President pro tempore of the Senate was not removable at the pleasure of the Senate. I have no doubt that the reason for saying anything about the Senate having power to elect a President pro tempore grew out of the clause suggested by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] The fourth clause of the third section of the first article says:

> The Vice-President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no vote unless they be equally divided.

Now, to rebut the presumption that he was the only President of the Senate and that the Senate could not hold a session in his absence, the next clause provides that in his absence the Senate may elect a President pro tempore. When the Vice-President is absent the Senate is then on the same footing with every other deliberative body; that is, it has the power to elect its own presiding officer. The Constitution makes the Vice-President ex officio the President of the Senate. The Senate has no control over him except by impeachment, articles being preferred by the House of Representatives. That is an arbitrary provision, not common to most deliberative bodies. Then, to rebut any presumption that in the absence of the Vice-President the Senate could not hold a session, but must wait until he came back, it provides that the Senate may elect a President pro tempore. In other words, it simply puts the Senate then on the footing of other deliberative bodies that elect their own presiding officer.

What is the law in regard to deliberative bodies that elect their own presiding officer? The general law established by parliamentary usage, not only in England, but in this country and every other country, in State Legislatures, in city councils, whatever may be the grade or character of the presiding officer or of the body, is that in the absence of any provision giving to them another person as a presiding officer they may elect their own presiding officer and remove him at pleasure. The common parliamentary law is that a presiding officer elected by the body itself holds at the pleasure of the body. I will read from Cushing's Treatise on Parliamentary Law:

> It is essential, also, to the satisfactory discharge of the duties of a presiding officer, that he should possess the confidence of the body over which he presides, in the highest practicable degree. It is apparently for the purpose of securing this necessary confidence that the presiding officer is required to be chosen by the assembly itself, and by an absolute majority of votes; that he is removable by the assembly at its pleasure; and that he is excluded from all participation in the proceedings as a member. Each of these particulars requires to be briefly considered.

Again—

> The presiding officer, being freely elected by the members, by reason of the confidence which they have in him, is removable by them, at their pleasure, in the same manner, whenever he becomes permanently unable, by reason of sickness or otherwise, to discharge the duties of his place, and does not resign his office; or whenever he has in any manner, or for any cause, forfeited or lost the confidence upon the strength of which he was elected.

That is the common law applicable to all deliberative bodies who elect their presiding officers; and the reason is just as strong here as it is anywhere else. Now, let me consider for a moment the arguments that have been offered on the other side. First, the argument offered by my friend from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON.] He admits that the Senate can remove a President pro tempore for cause. Am I right?

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORTON. On articles of impeachment being preferred by the House?

Mr. MERRIMON. By dealing with him as a Senator.

Mr. MORTON. The Senate, according to his admission, may of its own motion change this officer; he says "for cause." Who is to judge of that cause? The Senate. Whether it be good cause or bad cause, indifferent cause or no cause at all, the Senate is the exclusive judge of it. It may be because he has commit ed high crimes and misdemeanors, or it may be that he does not represent the sentiments of a majority of the body, or that he is not satisfactory as a Presiding Officer, or for any other reason. The Senate may remove him, he says, for cause. Well, as the Senate is the exclusive judge of that cause, it seems to me that admits the whole case. When the Senate comes to make the removal it is not bound to assign a cause; it is not bound to give any reason for it. It is presumed there must be some cause, but whether the cause is sufficient, reasonable, or unreasonable, the Senate is the exclusive judge. Therefore it amounts simply to this, that the Senate, according to his own admission, may change the Presiding Officer at pleasure. Where is the law that requires the Senate to prefer charges against the Presiding Officer? Where is the law that specifies the character of the cause that must be assigned? There is no law of that kind. The cause is the pleasure of the Senate. Whatever reason there may be sufficient to move a majority of the Senate to make a change, that is all the cause that is required; and the Senate is not required to state it, to put it in writing, or to have it expressed verbally upon the floor. Take my friend's own doctrine and it amounts simply to this, that the President pro tempore holds at the pleasure of the Senate.

Mr. NORWOOD. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question?

Mr. MORTON. Certainly.

Mr. NORWOOD. Suppose the President of the United States were to die to-day; would not our present President pro tempore be President of the United States to-morrow; and, if so, could we change him and elect another man to that office to-morrow morning? Would he not become instantly upon the death of the President of the United States the occupant of the executive office? Could we then to-morrow by a vote here change that officer?
